General Editors' Preface

Critical studies in Jaina religion and philosophy and researches in Jaina literature have conspicuously lagged behind in the march of Oriental scholarship with the result that our picture and perspective of Indian cultural heritage are far from being perfect and complete. Very often eminent scholars both from abroad and at home have stressed the pressing need of speeding up the progress of Jaina studies by critically editing ancient texts in different languages and by researches in various branches of Jainology.

Brahmachārī Jīvarāja Gautamachandajī, Sholapur, whose biography is already included in the First Volume of this Series (Tiloyapannatti, part 1, pp 9-12), is well-known for his piety, love of learning and philanthropic zeal. It was with a view to advance the cause of Jaina studies that the Jīvarāja Jaina Granthamālā was started under the auspices of the Jaina Samskr̥ti Samrāksaka Samgha which was founded by him by creating a Trust for it of his entire property amounting to about two lakhs of rupees

It is with great pleasure that the General Editors present to the world of scholars this learned work, Yasastilaka and Indian Culture, by Professor K K Handiqui as the Second Volume of the Jīvarāja Jaina Granthamālā. Though the Yasastilaka (A. D. 959) had attracted the attention of Sanskrit scholars like Peterson and others, the literary genius and the wealth of learning of Somadeva were not fully appreciated. This dissertation will enable us now to assess the value of Somadeva's achievements in Indian literature. Somadeva, as Professor Handiqui has observed, 'is one of the most versatile talents in the history of Indian literature, and his masterpiece Yasastilaka reveals the manifold aspects of his genius. He is a master of prose and verse, a profound scholar with a well-stocked memory, an authority on Jaina dogma, and a critic of contemporary philosophical systems. He is a close student of the art of Government, and in this respect his Yasastilaka and Nitivākyaṃrta supplement each other. He is a redactor of ancient folktales and religious stories, and at times shows himself an adept in dramatic dialogue. Last but not least, he is a keen observer of men and manners. The position of Somadeva is, indeed, unique in Sanskrit literature.'

Turning to Somadeva's Yasastilaka, 'the salient feature of the story of Yaśodhara is that it is a realistic tale based on a domestic tragedy, even an unpleasant incident of domestic life, around which is woven a story of moral and religious edification'. It 'is, as a matter of fact, the only considerable Sanskrit prose romance which deals with tragic incidents of conjugal life, eschewing romantic love in favour of grim realities and the workings of fate'. Though the chief object of this tale is to propound the highest standard of human morals, namely, the principle of Ahimsā, Somadeva has made his religious romance an elegant specimen of artistic Sanskrit prose and poetry. 'Apart from its special characteristics as a prose narrative, Yasastilaka combines features which bring it into relation with diverse branches of Sanskrit literature. It is not only a Jaina romance in prose and verse but a learned compendium of Jaina and non-Jaina philosophical and religious doctrines, a manual of statecraft, and a great repository of Kāvya poetry, ancient tales, citations and references, and numerous rare words of lexical interest. Somadeva's Yasastilaka is a work of massive scholarship enlivened by occasional flashes of literary genius and poetic feeling.'

It is indeed very happy that such a masterpiece of literature as the Yasastilaka is thoroughly studied in its various aspects by an eminent and versatile Sanskritist of the status and standing of Professor Handiqui. His mastery over the niceties of the Sanskrit language and Kāvya poetry are well-known to all by his 'English Translation of Śrīharsa's Narsadhacarita with extracts from unpublished commentaries, appendices on philosophical allusions etc.', Lahore 1934. Thus Somadeva for his literary rehabilitation has found a worthy scholar in Professor Handiqui who possesses rare qualities of sympathetic and judicious understanding, wide and rich information and deep and critical learning. He undertook and completed the study of Yasastilaka while he was the Principal and Senior Professor of History and Sanskrit at J. B. College, Jorhat (Assam). Very few Sanskrit works have been studied as thoroughly as the Yasastilaka in this work; and Professor Handiqui deserves every praise for his steady labours and painstaking researches. The Sanskrit studies have become richer by his present contribution.

The Authorities of the Jīvarāja Jaina Granthamālā offer their sincere thanks to Professor K. K. Handiqui for his generosity in placing his learned dissertation at their disposal for publication in this Series.

It is a matter of pleasure for the General Editors to record their thanks to Br. Jīvarājajī as well as to the members of the Trust Committee and Prabandhasamiti for their active interest in the Series, and also to Professor Handiqui for his willing cooperation. They trust that the present volume is a worthy contribution to Indian studies, and it would open in future many a new line of study in the fields of Jaina religion, philosophy and literature.

PREFACE

Somadeva's Yasastilaka was composed in 959 A. D. somewhere in the area corresponding to modern Dharwar and the westernmost districts of Hyderabad State. It is a Jaina religious romance written in Sanskrit prose and verse, but more important as an encyclopedic record of literary, socio-political, religious and philosophical data, valuable for the study of the cultural history of India, and particularly of the Deccan, in the tenth century and thereabouts, when the Rāṣtrakūta empire still held sway in that part of the country. The object of the present volume is a critical study of the work, and if we have often gone far outside the limits of the text, it was only to give a more comprehensive picture of the life and thought of the times with reference to antecedent and subsequent factors in Indian cultural development.

The Sanskrit text was published long ago by the Nirṇaya Sagar press in two volumes of a little over a thousand pages with the commentary of Śrutasāgara. The second volume of the work appeared in 1903, and the second edition of the first volume in 1916. A voluminous Jaina text composed in a difficult style could hardly be expected to be popular even with advanced students of Indian literature. To add to our difficulties, the commentary, which is our only guide to the work, breaks off at p 244 of the second volume, and the printed text was found to be far too defective to admit of a critical study of the work.

To obviate these difficulties, I have utilized the following manuscripts of the text kindly lent by the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Poona: 1) ms. A No 230 of 1902-07, folios 434, 2) ms. B No 752 of 1886-92, folios 391, 3) ms. C No 274 of A. 1883-84, folios 341, and 4) another incomplete manuscript of the work. Of these ms. A is the most important. It is not only correct but contains valuable marginal notes which have been of great use in studying the text, specially the portion dealing with Jaina doctrines, on which the commentary is not available. Notes from ms. A have been incorporated in the present work, and, here and there, a line or a verse omitted in the printed text has been added from the manuscripts in the footnotes. In fact, nearly all the quotations from Somadeva's Yasastilaka in the present volume have been collated with the manuscripts, especially A.

I am grateful to Dr. A. N. Upadhye, Kolhapur, for his generous and voluntary offer to publish this work on behalf of the Jaina Samskr̥ti Samraksaka Samgha of Sholapur. The munificence of the Samgha has made the publication possible in a comparatively short time, but the work would not have appeared in a presentable form without Dr. Upadhye's tireless efforts.

Dr. V. Raghavan of Madras University was kind enough to send me an offprint of his interesting paper Gleanings from Somadevasūri's Yasastilaka Campū published in Ganganatha Jha Research Institute Journal (February-August, 1944). Dr. Raghavan refers in his paper to the unpublished commentary of Śrīdeva on the text. It is a fragment of 34 leaves preserved in the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, and its existence was not known to me at the time of borrowing the manuscripts mentioned above.

I am indebted to my friend Prof. P. K. Gode, Curator, Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, for help in connection with manuscripts, and especially for carefully made copies of articles and papers otherwise inaccessible to me. The photographs of the sculptures relating to the ancient Jaina Stūpa of Mathura were a gift from Dr. Vasudev Agiawala when he was Curator of the Provincial Museum, Lucknow. The Śaiva sculpture preserved in the Rajputana Museum, Ajmer, is reproduced in this book with the kind permission of the Archaeological Survey of India. My sincere thanks are due to S. J. Brajendra Kumar Acharya, Lecturer in Bengali, Cotton College, for compiling the General Index.

CHAPTER I

SOMADEVA AND HIS AGE

Two works of Somadeva are extant *Yasastilaka*¹ and *Nitivākya-mṛta*² The former, called also Yaśodhara-mahārāja-carita, deals with the pathetic story of Prince Yaśodhara in prose and verse in eight Books called Āśvāsas The latter work is a treatise on polity, divided into thirty-two chapters consisting of aphorisms on the various topics dealt with. Nitivākya-mṛta seems to have been written after Yasastilaka.

Somadeva gives a fair amount of information about himself at the end of his Yasastilaka. He belonged to an order of Jaina monks known as Devasamgha, and was the disciple of Nemideva who was the disciple of Yaśodeva³ The colophon to Nitivākya-mṛta tells us that Somadeva was the younger brother of Mahendradeva, and had the following honorific titles. Śyādvādācalasimha 'A lion on the mountain of Śyādvāda', Tārkika-cakravartin 'The Lord of the logicians', Vādibha-pañcānana 'A lion to the elephants, o wit, the disputants', Vākkallola-payomdhī 'An ocean of the waves of loquence', and Kavikularāja 'The king of the poets'. We are also told that Somadeva was the author of Yaśodhara-mahārāja-carita, Sanṇavati-rakarana, Mahendra-mātali-saṃjalpa and Yuktacintāmanisūtra. There is some doubt about the title of the last work, as a manuscript of Nitivākya-mṛta written in Samvat 1290, and preserved in one of the Jaina Bhandārs at Pattan, gives it as *Yuktacintāmanistava*⁴.

In one of the concluding verses of Yasastilaka Somadeva tells us that the work was copied by a celebrated scribe named Racchuka, who was called ekhaka-śikhāmanī, and whose calligraphy seems to have been utilized by the fair sex for their love-letters⁵ All trace of this first copy of the original manuscript seems to have been lost.

Somadeva goes on to say that the Kāvya, that is, Yasastilaka was composed in Śaka 881 (959 A. D.), the cyclic year being Siddhānta, on the Madana-trayodaśī day of the month of Caitra, when Kīrṇarājadeva was extending his sway at Melpātī, after having vanquished the Pāndya, Cola, Cerama (i. e. Cera), Ceylonese and other kings¹ Somadeva's statement is remarkable for its historical accuracy, as it is corroborated by the Karhād plates of the great Rāstrakūṭa emperor Kṛṣṇa III, issued on the 9th March, 959 A. D., at Melpātī, a few weeks earlier than the completion of Somadeva's *Yasastilaka*² The subject of the inscription is the grant of a village in Karahāta (Karhād in Satara district) to a Śaiva ascetic, but the record was issued at Melpātī (Melpādī in North Arcot district), where the emperor was encamped with his victorious army 'for establishing his followers in the southern provinces, for taking possession of the estates of the provincial chiefs and for constructing certain temples'.³ The inscription, like Somadeva, refers to Kṛṣṇa III's victories over the Colas and the kings of the Ceranma (i. e. Cera), Pāndya and other countries as well as Ceylon, and tells us, besides, that he erected a pillar of victory at Rāmeśvara.⁴ The emperor states in the record that he issues the order, 'having established his victorious camp at Melpātī' (melpātī-samāvāsita-srīmadadvaya-katakēna mayā).

The victory over the Colas was the most important, as Kṛṣṇa III is known to have occupied Tondaimandalam (to the north of the Kāveri), and appears to have annexed the northern part of the Cola dominions to his empire, sometime after the decisive battle of Takkolam in 949 A. D., when the Cola crown-prince Rājāditya, the son of Parāntaka I, was killed on the battlefield by Kṛṣṇa's tributary and ally, the Gaṅga ruler Būtuga II.⁵ The Karhād grant of 959 A. D. shows the Rāstrakūṭa emperor in his camp at Melpātī at the close of his victorious southern campaigns. As a recent authority on Cola history says, "there can be no question that the effect on the Cola empire was ruinous, and that as a consequence of the blow in the north, much of the south also slipped out of Parāntaka's hands. The Cola empire was no more, it had to be built up all over again".¹

It is interesting to note that the Melpāṭi camp of Kṛṣṇa III is mentioned also by Puspadanta in his Mahāpurāṇa, a voluminous work in Apabhramśa verse on the lives of the sixty-three heroes (śalākā-purusas) of the Jaina faith, commenced in 959 A. D., that is, in the year of the completion of Somadeva's Yasastilaka, and finished in 965 A. D.² Puspadanta says in his Mahāpurāṇa 1 3—

| तं कहमि पुराणु पसिद्धणामु | सिद्धत्थवरिसि भुवणाहिरामु । |
| उब्बज्जुडु भूमंगभीसु | तोडेप्पिणु चोडहो तणउ सीसु । |

| तं दीणदिण्णधणकणयपयह | सहि परिभमंतु मेपाडिणयह । |

Puspadanta means to say that he commenced his Purāṇa in the cyclic year Siddhārtha (the same as that mentioned by Somadeva) when 'the lord of kings', Tudiga, explained in the gloss as Kṛṣṇarāja, was in the city of Mepāḍi, identified in the gloss with Melapāṭiya-nagara, that is, Melpāṭi, after having severed the Cola prince's head 'with the hair tied up'. This is obviously a reference to Rājāditya's death in the battle of Takkolam, the memory of which was still fresh in 959. Puspadanta describes the town of Melpāṭi as 'rolling in festivities', and as a place where presents of money and gold had been given to the poor. It is natural to surmise that Kṛṣṇa III was celebrating his southern victories at Melpāṭi that year, and the town was in a gay mood on account of the celebrations. The year 959 A. D. was indubitably a year of political and cultural importance in the history of the Dekkan, as it not only saw the consummation of Rāstrakūṭa hegemony in the south, but the commencement and completion respectively of two monumental works of Indian literature.

Although Somadeva was a contemporary of Kṛṣṇa III, his work was not composed at Mānyakheta, the Rāstrakūṭa capital, but at an obscure place called Gangadhārā, which seems to have been the capital of a prince named Vāgarāja, the eldest son of a Čalukya chief named Arikesariṇ, a tributary of Kṛṣṇarāja.³ The Arikesariṇ mentioned by Somadeva belonged to an obscure branch of the Cālukya dynasty, which ruled over a province called Jola, a portion of which is said to have been included in the modern district of Dhārwar in Bombay Presidency¹ Nothing is known about Gaṅgadhārā, but it seems to have been somewhere in or around Dharwar District. It may perhaps be identified with Gangawati in the south-western corner of Hyderabad State in Raichur District, quite near Dharwar. There is also a river named Gangawati in the North Kanara District south-west of Dharwar²

As regards the prince during whose reign Somadeva composed his romance, there is some doubt about the reading of the name Vāgarāja found in the printed text of Yasastilaka. Of the manuscripts of the work used by me, the well-written and correct A reads Vāgarāja as in the printed edition, but mss. B and C read Vādyarāja, while a manuscript consulted by Pt. Nathuram Premi reads Vadyagarāja³ The correct name, as we shall see, seems to be Baddiga of which Vādyarāja and Vadyagarāja are Sanskritized variations

A copper plate inscription in Sanskrit recently found at Parbhani in Hyderabad State⁴ not only gives us a glimpse of Somadeva seven years after the composition of Yasastilaka but furnishes a genealogy of the feudatory Cālukya chiefs in whose territory he lived and worked. The genealogy of these tributaries of the Rāṣtrakūtas, hitherto known to us from the Kanarese Bhārata composed by the Jaina poet Pampa in 941 A. D.,⁵ is here carried to 966 A. D., the date of the inscription. The list of kings may be compiled as follows

Yuddhamalla I, Arikesarin I, Narasimha I (+Bhadradeva), Yuddhamalla II, Baddiga I (defeated and captured Bhima), Yuddhamalla III, Narasimha II, Arikesarin II (married a Rāṣtrakūta princess named Lokāmbikā), Bhadradeva, Arikesarin III, Baddiga II (Vadyaga) and Arikesarin IV.

Of the kings mentioned Arikesarin II was the patron of Pampa who wrote his masterpieces in 941 A. D., while Baddiga II or Vadyaga was the king during whose reign Somadeva completed his romance in the year 959 A. D., as recorded in the colophon. The inscription under discussion records the grant of a village to Somadeva by Vadyaga's son Arikesarin IV in Śaka 888 or 966 A D for the repairs and upkeep of a Jaina temple called Śubhadhāma-jinālaya, built by Vadyaga in the capital (Lem)bulapātaka. The name of the village granted to Somadeva was Vanikatupulu¹

It is clear from the above record that in 966 A D Somadeva was in charge of the Śubhadhāma temple, and seems to have carried on his literary activities undisturbed, as a hitherto unknown work Syādvāḍopaniṣad is here attributed to him in addition to *Yasodharacarita*² He was held in the highest esteem by his contemporaries, and kings and feudatory chiefs are described as reverently bowing at his feet³

It may be noted in this connection that there are at least two puzzling factors in the inscription we are considering Firstly, the Samgha to which Somadeva belonged is here called Gaudasamgha Yaśodeva, the guru of Somadeva's guru Nemideva, is assigned to this Samgha⁴ But, as we have seen, Somadeva himself describes Yaśodeva as belonging to the Devasamgha. Secondly, the capital of Arikesarin IV is stated to be (Lem)bulapātaka, about which nothing definite is known, although it might be somewhere in Hyderabad State It is noteworthy that we have so far the names of three capitals of the Cālukya chiefs who ruled in the Jola territory Arikesarin II, who was the patron of the famous Kannada poet Pampa, ruled at Pulgere (mod. Lakshmesvar in Dharwar District),⁵ Vadyaga is described by Somadeva as ruling at Gaṅgadhārā, and his son Arikesarin IV calls (Lem)bulapātaka his capital It may also be noted that just as Arikesarin, the father of Vadyaga, is described by Somadeva as a humble tributary of Kṛṣṇarāja (Kṛṣṇa III), similarly the present inscription describes Arikesarin, the son of Vadyaga, as a tributary of the same overlord in exactly similar terms⁶ patron properly so called. Somadeva was a Jaina Ācārya and respectfully mentions his guru. He was, besides, a political thinker, and in his Nīti śāstramṛta pays homage to the state and not to any king¹. It is, however, certain that he was intimately acquainted with court life, and may have passed some time in the Rāstrakūṭa capital. The court life so minutely described by him in Book III of his Yasastilaka does not apply to a petty feudatory chief like that of Gangadhārā, and can be true only of a sovereign of imperial status, who receives embassies from foreign courts, declares war against refractory kings, and has at his disposal regiments drawn from different parts of Hindustan². Somadeva, the author of Nītvākyaṃṛta, was a patriotic citizen of the Rāstrakūṭa empire, and gave much thought to the principles of state-craft and the well-being of the state, and in his great romance he gives a picture of the imperial court, besides throwing sidelights on the problems of government affecting war and peace.

The tenth century, like its predecessor, was a flourishing period of Jaina literature in Sanskrit and Prākṛit, and in Kanarese as well. Confining ourselves to the epoch of Somadeva, we may safely assume it to coincide with the reign of Kṛṣṇa III from 939 to 968 A. D., and within these limits we come across several distinguished names in the annals of scholarship and literature. In 941 the famous Kanarese poet Pampa wrote his two poems, Ādipurāṇa, which relates the history of the first Tīrthamkara, and Vikramādyūna-vijaya, which tells the story of the Mahābhārata, or rather that of Arjuna. About the year 950 Ponna, the second great Kanarese poet of the century, wrote his Sāntipurāṇa, which relates the legendary history of the sixteenth Tīrthamkara, under the patronage of Kṛṣṇa III who gave the poet the honorific title of Ubhaya-kavi-cakravartin for his proficiency in Kanarese and Sanskrit.³ Quite at the beginning of the reign of Kṛṣṇa III, Indranandin wrote in Sanskrit a work called Jvālāmālīnī-kalpa dealing with a mystic fire-cult associated with the goddess Jvālāmālīnī. The work was composed in 939 A. D. at Mānyakheta and refers to Kṛṣṇarāja.⁴

Among the immediate contemporaries of Somadeva we come across two distinguished names Puspadanta and Muñjārya Vādighaṅghala Bhaṭṭa. We have already referred to the former, who commenced his Mahāpurāṇa in 959 A. D. under the patronage of Kṛṣṇa III's minister Bharata, and wrote two other works, Jasaharacarita, which, like Somadeva's Yasastilaka, relates the story of Yaśodhara, and Nāyakumāracarit or the story of Nāgakumāra, both under the patronage of Bharata's son and successor Nanna¹ Puspadanta wrote in Apabhramśa verse, and is one of the most important Jaina poets in that language so far discovered, and his prodigious literary activity bears witness to the flourishing condition of Apabhramśa literature in the tenth century. Hariṣena² who wrote his Dharmaparīkṣā in Apabhramśa in 988 A. D. mentions three distinguished Apabhramśa poets Puspadanta, Svayambhu and Caturmukha, and Puspadanta himself refers to Svayambhu and Caturmukha in his Mahāpurāṇa 19.³ The works of Svayambhu—Paumacarit and Rutthanemīcarit—are available in manuscript, and his son Tribhuvana Svayambhu was also a poet and made substantial additions to his father's poems⁴ Svayambhu may be assigned to the eighth or ninth century, as he mentions Ravisena, the author of Padmacarita (seventh century), in his Paumacarit, and is himself mentioned by Puspadanta. Caturmukha is earlier than Svayambhu, as the latter mentions him in his Rutthanemīcarit and other works. It is also noteworthy that a number of other Apabhramśa poets is cited by Svayambhu in another work of his, a treatise on Prosody called Śaṅkharāṭṭh. There was thus a well-defined literary tradition in Apabhramśa in and before Somadeva's time, and there is no doubt that he was to some extent influenced by the prevailing current of Apabhramśa poetry, as he has used various Apabhramśa metres with considerable skill in a number of verses of his *Yaśastilaka*⁵ The use of Apabhramśa metres in Sanskrit verse is a novel experiment on the part of a writer who sets out to write classical Sanskrit in the style of Subandhu and Bāna, but it shows the wide range of Somadeva's literary equipment and his interest in the vernacular literature of the time. Further, in spite of the divergent character of the works of Somadeva and Puspadanta, they seem to have occasionally drawn on common sources for some at least of the literary material handled by them. The story of Yaśodhara itself is one such example, while the tale of Jamadagni and the two birds, and that of Śrībhūti and Bhadramitra related by Somadeva as independent stories in Yaśastilaka, Books VI and VII⁶, occur in Puspadanta's Mahāpurāṇa (LXV 13 ff and LVII 7 ff) as part of a larger scheme of Jaina religious and mythological stories.

Muñjāryya Vādighanghala Bhatta is known to us from the Kudlur plates of the Ganga king Mārasimha, dated 963 A D¹ Mārasimha was a tributary of Krsna III, and the grant of a village to Vādighanghala Bhatta by the former forms the subject of the inscription, which eloquently describes the great Jaina teacher's attainments and influence Vādighanghala Bhatta was a distinguished grammarian and seems to have propounded a system of grammar on a sure and sound basis² He was an expert in Lokāyata, Sāmkhya and Buddhist philosophy as well as Vedic interpretation,³ a great master of Jaina doctrine, and an eminent poet He was intimately connected with the Ganga king Būtuga II and Krsna III and the Rāstrakūta capital. We are told that his faultless and eloquent elucidation of literature (sāhitya-vidyā) made Ganga-Gāngeya (Būtuga II), 'a cuckoo in the pleasure-garden of learning', his pupil He was honoured by the learned men of Vallabharāja's capital, who were enlightened by his exposition of all branches of political science,⁴ and Vallabharāja seems to be no other than Krsna III who is called Vallabhanarendradeva in the Karhād grant, and Vallabhanarendra and Vallabharāya in Puspadanta's works⁵ Krsna is, moreover, explicitly mentioned in the inscription, which declares that Krsnarājadeva, who with his tributaries honoured the master, conquered the regions by acting upon his counsel, which was 'sound in relation to the present as well as the future'.⁶ It would thus appear that while Somadeva was preoccupied with the theoretical principles of state-craft, Vādighanghala Bhatta played the role of a practical statesman and acted as a political adviser to the Rāstrakūta emperor The glory and achievements of the empire seem to have opened new vistas before the thinking men of the age, and persons like Somadeva and Vādighanghala Bhatta, who in other times would probably have confined themselves to literature or speculative thought, took a deep interest in matters of vital importance to the state. The disruption of the Rāstrakūta empire after Krsna III must have been a rude shock to cultural possibilities in the Dekkan

Two important Jaina poets Vādirāja and Vādibhasimha are said to be Somadeva's disciples Śrutasāgara in his commentary on Yasastilaka 2 126 quotes a statement which represents Somadeva as saying that both Vādirāja and Vādibhasimha are his disciples¹ The statement cannot, however, be traced in the two extant works of Somadeva, and neither Vādirāja nor Vādibhasimha claims Somadeva as his guru in any of their works Vādirāja says at the end of his Pārśvanāthacarita, a poem in 12 cantos, that his guru is Matisāgara, besides, he belonged to the Nandisamgha, while Somadeva belonged to the Devasamgha Similarly, Vādibhasimha in his prose romance Gadyacintāmaṇi 16 gives expression to his deep obligations to his guru Puṣpasena On the other hand, it is not chronologically impossible for Vādirāja and Vādibhasimha to be regarded as disciples of Somadeva. Vādirāja, according to his own statement, wrote his Pārśvanāthacarita in Śaka 947 (1025 A D) during the reign of the Western Cālukya king Jayasimha II who ruled from 1015 to 1042 A D. As regards Vādibhasimha, he as well as Vādirāja is mentioned in the Belgāmve grant of Jayasimha II, dated 1036 A D, which describes a Śaiva savant named Vādi-Rudraguna as having defeated in argument Vādibhasimha, Vādirāja and other scholars², and the great king Rājarāja mentioned at the end of Vādibhasimha's poem *Ksātracūdāmaṇi*³ might very well refer to the Cola king Rājarāja the Great who ruled from 985 to 1014 A D It will be thus seen that Vādirāja and Vādibhasimha flourished in the first quarter of the eleventh century, and assuming Śrutasāgara's statement to be correct and genuine, they may be regarded as having been Somadeva's disciples during their boyhood But, nevertheless, it is strange that they should be so completely silent about their early guru Somadeva

The epoch of Somadeva was preceded and followed by a considerable output of Jaina literature in various parts of India Among his predecessors, from the beginning of the ninth century to the early part of the tenth, we find such names as Vīrasena (author of the Dhavalā commentary and part of the Jayadhavalā), Jinasena (completed the Jayadhavalā and wrote Ādipurāṇa and other works), Gunabhadra (author of Uttarapurāṇa and Ātmānusāsana), the Jaina Śakatāyana, Vidyānanda (author of Aṣṭasaḥasrī, Tattvārthaslokavārtika etc), Siddharsi (author of Upamatiḥhavaḥprapañcā kathā), and Harisena (author of Kathākosā) and others, while among his immediate successors, from about the last quarter of the tenth century to the first quarter of the eleventh, we find Kanarese writers like Cāmundarāya (wrote in prose Cāmundarāya-purāṇa), Ranna (wrote Ajitapurāṇa and Amṛtāvalī), and Nāgavarma (author of the Kanarese version of Bāṇa's Kaṭha), philosophical writers like Nemicaṇḍia Siddhāntacakravartin (wrote in Prākṛit Gōmātasāra, Dhavyasamgraha and other works) and Prabhācandra (author of Nyāyakuṃṇḍacandra and Prameyakaṃalamārtanda); and poets and scholars like Vāḍirāja (wrote Pārsvanāthacarita, Kāḥutsthacārita and Yasodhāracarita), Vāḍibhasiṃha (wrote Gadyacintāmaṇi and Āśvācūdāmaṇi), Dhanapāla (author of Tilakamañjarī), Amitagati (author of Siddhāntaratnasamdhā, Dharmaparīkṣā and other works), Asaga (author of Yasodhāracarita), Mahāseṇa (author of Pradyumṇacarita), Vīraṇandin (author of Candraprabhācarita), and perhaps Kanakāmara (wrote Karakandācarita in Apabhraṃśa), and other writers like the grammarian Dayāpāla (author of Rūpasiddhi and contemporary of Vāḍirāja)

While Somadeva made substantial contributions to Jaina religious literature, his literary importance and achievement go beyond its narrow limits, and the value of his work can be assessed in relation to Sanskrit literature as a whole. He is one of the most versatile talents in the history of Indian literature, and his masterpiece Yasastilaka reveals the manifold aspects of his genius. He is a master of prose and verse, a profound scholar with a well-stocked memory, an authority on Jaina dogma, and a critic of contemporary philosophical systems. He is a close student of the art of government, and in this respect his Yasastilaka and Nītivākyaṃṛta supplement each other. He is a redactor of ancient folktales and religious stories, and at times shows himself an adept in dramatic dialogue. Last but not least, he is a keen observer of men and manners. The position of Somadeva is, indeed, unique in Sanskrit literature.

Despite the fact that Somadeva's reputation rests on a prose romance and a treatise on polity, he was primarily a Jaina theologian, and nearly half of Yasastilaka and presumably the lost works are devoted to the defence and exposition of the tenets of the Jaina faith. He acknowledges the fact himself and would have us believe that his poetry was a byproduct of his philosophical studies. He tells us in one of the opening verses of Yasastilaka that just as a cow yields milk by eating grass, similarly his intellect produced the beautiful utterances of his poetical composition by feeding on the dry logical studies, to which he had devoted himself since his childhood.¹ Tarka or philosophical argumentation was Somadeva's true vocation, and his honorific titles Tārkikacakravartin and Vāḍibhapañcāna point to the fact that he, like many intellectuals of his age, spent a good deal of his energy in engaging in controversy influential disputants belonging to rival faiths. This was, in fact, a trait of the times, as can be seen from such peculiar but significant names as Vādirāja, Vādibhasimha, Vādigharatta, Vādighanghala, Paravādimalla, Vādikolāhala etc., found among the Jaina writers and scholars of the age. That this was a practice common to all the schools is evident from I-tsing's eloquent description of it in his account of education in India towards the end of the seventh century. "When they are refuting heretic doctrines", says the Chinese traveller, "all their opponents become tongue-tied and acknowledge themselves undone. Then the sound of their fame makes the five mountains (of India) vibrate, and their renown flows, as it were, over the four borders." "They oppose the heretics as they would drive beasts (deer) in the middle of a plain, and explain away disputations as boiling water melts frost. In this manner they become famous throughout Jambudvīpa (India), receive respect above gods and men, and serving under the Buddha and promoting His doctrine, they lead all the people (to Nirvāna)"¹

The Praśasti verses of Nītvākyaṃṛta emphasize Somadeva's activity as a controversialist, and proclaim his superiority to all prospective disputants. One of the verses, for instance, asks a disputant how he dares argue with Somadeva, not being an Akalanka in argumentation nor a Ham-sasiddhāntadeva in the knowledge of traditional lore nor a Pūjyapāda in eloquence

सकलसमयतर्के नाकलङ्कोऽसि वादी न भवसि समयोक्तौ हंससिद्धान्तदेव ।

न च वचनविलसे पूज्यपादोऽसि तत्त्वं वदसि कथमिदानीं सोमदेवेन सार्धम् ॥

The final verse trumpets Somadeva's eloquence which strikes terror into the hearts of all disputants, and claims that even Bihaspati cannot hold his own in argument with him.²

While these boasts and eulogies are of a conventional character, they reveal one aspect of Somadeva's intellectual equipment, and he was perhaps as assiduous in his polemical activity as any of his contemporaries. This, however, should not blind us to the fact that poetry and literature must have made heavy claims on his time and intellectual effort, as the composition of an extensive work like Yasastilaka in prose and verse was bound to presuppose long and careful preparation, involving laborious study of the secular branches of study and fervent devotion to the art of poetry. His statement that he had studied Tarka since his childhood shows that he began his career as a student of logic, metaphysics and allied subjects, and seems to have taken to poetry late in his life. But his devotion to his second love was no less sincere, and apparently he came to realise that poetry was an exacting mistress. As he says at the beginning of his work,

निद्रा विदूरयसि शास्त्ररसं ह्यसि सर्वेन्द्रियार्थमसमर्थविधिं विधत्से ।

चेतश्च विभ्रमयसे कविते पिशाचि लोकस्तथापि सुकृती त्वदनुग्रहेण ॥ 1 41.

‘Thou Muse, thou evil genius, thou dost dismiss sleep, hinder delight in the Śāstras, reduce all the senses to impotence, and bewilder the mind. Yet men are lucky if they obtain thy favour’

The combination of Tarka and Poetry, so prominent in the case of Somadeva, is not an isolated phenomenon in Indian literary history. Śriharsa, the author of Narsadhacarita and Khaṇḍanakhaṇḍakhāḍya, is a classic example of this tendency, which is also observed occasionally in lesser known poets. We may refer, for example, to Trailokya who flourished in Kashmir in the first half of the twelfth century, and is mentioned by Mankhaka in Srikanṭhacarita 25 65, 66¹. It is noteworthy that Mankhaka compares Trailokya to Tutātita or Kumārila, who is also supposed to have been a Tārkika as well as a Kavi, although no poem composed by him has come down to us.

It may be safely assumed that Yasastilaka was the product of that period of Somadeva's life when his poetic power had reached its full maturity. The author makes certain claims for his work which will bear the scrutiny of investigation.

First, he says that he composed his work without aid from any source and without any model before him, and therefore compares it to a gem produced by the ocean.

असहायमनादर्शं रत्नं रत्नाकरादिव । मत्तः काव्यमिदं जातं सतां हृदयमण्डनम् ॥ 1 14

The claim of originality, like all such claims, may be admitted only in a limited sense. Somadeva cannot claim any originality regarding the plot, but there are some novel features in regard to the form and contents of the romance, which distinguish it from other versions of the story of Yaśodhara and, indeed, from other prose romances extant in Prakrit or Sanskrit. It may be added that the claim of originality is in conformity with Somadeva's idea that a poet should rely upon his own efforts and not imitate or borrow from others. He declares that the poet, who keeps before him the works of his predecessors and consults them again and again and expresses himself in the same manner or differently, is a plagiarist (‘poetry thief’) and a sinner.

It is, however, conceded that occasional similarity with other writers in ideas or expression cannot detract from the merits of a poet who is not in the habit of looking into the works of others कृतीः परेषामविलोकमानस्तदुक्तिवत्कापि कविर्न हीनः । 1. 12.

Somadeva's theory of poetical self-sufficiency is no doubt exaggerated and belied by literary history, but we may be certain that he relied mainly upon his own resources in the composition of his encyclopedic work

Secondly, Somadeva says that he who has the curiosity to go through his work can avail himself of poetic utterances, appropriate dicta, and the tenets of all the Śāstras उक्तयः कवितकान्ताः सूक्तयोऽवसरोचिताः । युक्तयः सर्वशास्त्रान्तास्तस्य यस्यात्र कौतुकम् ॥ 1. 15.

This is not an empty boast or arrogant self-assertion. Poetic merits apart, Yasastilaka is, indeed, a storehouse of information concerning the tenets of various Śāstras and schools of thought, and this aspect of the work conforms to the theory of Vyutpatti held by Somadeva himself and the writers on poetics. Somadeva tells us that there is one type of Kāvya, 'sweet to the ears' and eloquent with descriptions, and another type which charms the heart, being replete with meaning; no wise man will find fault with either of these, but proper and fit is that kind of composition which contributes to the all-round vyutpatti or scholarly instruction of the author himself and others

अत्रासूयेत् क इह सुकृती किंतु युक्तं तदुक्तं, यद्व्युत्पत्त्यै सकलविषये स्वस्य चान्यस्य च स्यात् ॥ 1. 16

The Vyutpatti mentioned by Somadeva has two aspects. The Vyutpatti of the poet is his scholarly training, and the idea of it appears in a systematic form in most writers on poetics, who lay stress on the importance of Vyutpatti as a supplementary discipline reinforcing Śakti or Pratibhā, or natural genius, while, among poets, Mankhaka emphasizes the value of Vyutpatti or Pāṇḍitya in his S'rikanthacarita (2. 5, 27, 45-48). Certain writers, e. g., Mammata, and especially Rājasekhara¹ who is closely followed by Hemacan-

1 Rājasekhara in Kāvyamīmāṃsā, chap 8, envisages a wide range of intellectual equipment for a poet, and enumerates twelve recognised sources of poetry: Śruti, Smṛti, Itihāsa, Purāṇa, Pramānavidyā or the philosophical systems, Samayavidyā or sectarian systems like those of the Śaivas, the Pāñcarātras, and the Buddhists, popularly called Āgama, the three Rājasiddhāntas consisting of Polity, Erotica, and Dramaturgy, Loka or a knowledge of the world, its geography and customs; Viracānā or fanciful stories and conceits, and Prakīrnaka or miscellaneous subjects like the science of elephants, the Dhanurveda, the science of gems, treatises on Yoga etc.

dra, and Vāgbhata, the author of Kāyānirṇaya, and Ksemendra, in his Kavīlanthābhāṣana, who employs the term Pañcayā for Vyutpatti, clearly enumerate the various branches of learning, with all or some of which the poet is expected to show his acquaintance. Considered from this standpoint, Somadeva's statement that his Kāvya is a repertory of all the Śāstras is corroborated to a large extent by an examination of the contents of the work, and there are few works in Kāvya literature which fulfil the conditions of Vyutpatti so completely as Somadeva's Yasastilaka.

The Vyutpatti of 'others', that is, of the readers of a poem refers to their instruction in the topics of the Śāstras, so that a Kāvya is viewed as a kind of introduction to the learned branches of study. Somadeva's view of this aspect of Vyutpatti may be correlated with the opinion of Bhāmaha, who says in his Kāvyālaṅkāra (chap V) that the Śāstras are, as a rule, difficult to understand and shunned by the untalented, who, however, enjoy them when mixed with the sweet potion of poetry, just as people take an unpalatable dose of medicine after tasting honey¹. In other words, the sāstric pill is to be sugared with poetry for the benefit of those who are unable to swallow it as it is. The difficult topics of the Śāstras should be made interesting and popular through poetry, and this the poet can do by expounding or referring to them in the course of his Kāvya. Bhāmaha, accordingly, goes on to say that there is no topic—no word, no meaning, no principle of logic, and no art or science—which does not serve as an element in poetical composition, and the poet's burden is undoubtedly great². It will be thus seen that the idea that a Kāvya should be a medium of instruction for its readers was prevalent long before the tenth century, and this idea no doubt greatly influenced the scope and composition of Somadeva's Yasastilaka.

Somadeva speaks of the great transmuting power of poetry. The true poets are those whose words make familiar things unfamiliar and unfamiliar things familiar.

त एव कवयो लोके येषां वचनगोचरः । सपूर्वोऽपूर्वतामर्थो यात्यपूर्वं सपूर्वताम् ॥ 1 25

This somehow reminds us of certain lines of Wordsworth on the contemplation of Nature

Familiar things and awful, the minute
And grand, are destined here to meet . . .³

But it is obviously the genius of the poet, working on a broader canvas, that makes the familiar awful and the awful familiar

Somadeva asserts that even the animals are thrilled with joy when they hear the utterances of a good poet¹ This is an exaggeration, but he may have in mind the musical effect of lyric poetry

The question of appreciation of poetry is considered by Somadeva from the standpoint of poets in several verses The poets are said to be fond of people who may not be learned, but who can grasp the trend of the spoken word In other words, learning is not necessary for the appreciation of poetry the excellence of gold is, for instance, demonstrated by the touchstone which is of inferior value.² The ability of laymen to judge the merits of poetry, although they are not poets themselves, is set forth by citing the example of the man who can discern the flavour of sweets while eating, although he is ignorant of the process of boiling sugar³ As for princes, poetical efforts are useless when a king lacks in judgment, it is no use putting rich fare before an animal who feeds on grass.⁴ The populace also lacks in judgment and delights in a poem, simply because it is reputed to be good, it often happens that literary works are held in esteem solely on account of their being accepted as good by others, just as a woman acquires a reputation for beauty when she becomes someone's mistress⁵ In matters affecting poetry, one should appeal to the judgment only of those who, like the ocean, 'keep within' (i.e. bear in mind) what is good, and throw out what is bad, that is, the true critic is one who appreciates the merits of a poem, ignoring the defects⁶ Further, a thing ought to be judged on its own merits and not in relation to a type to which it does not belong, it is futile to look for the sheen of gold while testing silver In other words, poetry must be judged as poetry, and the critic must not expect to find in it what does not properly fall within the province of poetry⁷ Those who are blind to merits, being intent on fault-finding, and try to pass off blemishes as merits are unfit to study poetry being the enemies of the goddess of learning, they have indeed no right to study it⁸ Finally, it is useless to argue whether any one is a poet or not, since in the ultimate resort the ears and minds of the readers are capable of discerning the true nature of the spoken word and its significance respectively ¹

Somadeva exploited to the full the resources of the Sanskrit language, and has an undisputed claim to rank as a classical writer, but he could not altogether escape the influence of Jaina literary usage in handling Sanskrit prose and verse. A glaring instance is his use of manh for *ebhik*², a Prākṛitism found also in some other Jaina Sanskrit writers. He writes also klesa-bhāṇanah more than once (e g, in 3 388 and towards the end of Book VI), which is clearly against classical usage. A serious grammatical mistake occurs in 3 480

सुरपतिवधूहासोल्लासश्रिय श्रयदाकृतिः । प्रथमसमये चन्द्रोदयोत्तवास्तु मुदे सदा ॥

Here srayat, although it forms part of a Bahuvrihi compound, is made to govern sriyam. The editors of the N. S. edition of Yasastilaka propose to read 'ecchavisraya', but not only the printed text but the three manuscripts used by me have the incorrect form. An instance of loose construction is kināśa-lehm anavāpta-dhryah in 2 130. The commentator explains the phrase by supposing prati to be understood between the two compounds क्रीनाशकेलि यमकीडा प्रति अनवाप्तधिय अप्राप्तबुद्धय यावन्मरण नायातीत्यर्थं. Such irregularities are, however, few and far-between, and perhaps negligible considering the bulk of the work.

One of the most conspicuous characteristics of Somadeva as a writer is his use of numerous rare and unfamiliar words, many of which are not found elsewhere in Sanskrit literature. The command of vocabulary makes Yasastilaka an exceptionally fruitful source of Sanskrit lexicography, but the use of far-fetched words sometimes gives a pedantic air to the work. Somadeva is not, indeed, the word-hunter ridiculed by Athenaeus⁴, he is rather the learned researcher who tries to bring into use obsolete words. As a matter of fact, he distinctly refers to this aspect of his literary effort, when he says at the end of Book V that he has resuscitated words that had been swallowed by the crooked monster of Time.

अरालकालव्यालेन ये लीडा सांप्रत तु ते । शब्दा श्रीसोमदेवेन प्रोत्थाप्यन्ते किमद्भुतम् ॥

While Somadeva thus claims to have rescued long-forgotten words from oblivion, he also states that he has recovered words lying hidden at the bottom of the ocean of the Śāstras, and that with these gems of words he has made an ornament for the Goddess of speech.

In the latter verse Somadeva evidently refers to the unfamiliar words and the technical terms of the Śāstras which he has used in his Kāvya. This was, in fact, a trait of Kāvya literature, especially of the later period, but Somadeva seems in this respect to have gone further than any other writer of the age

Somadeva, like Bhavabhūti, sometimes gives expression to a sense of over-confidence in his own powers, and claims something like a monopoly of poetical talents (End of Book IV)

मया वागर्थसभारे भुक्ते सारस्वते रसे । कवयोऽन्ये भविष्यन्ति नूनमुच्छिष्टभोजना ॥

In another place he says that if there are any honest people efficient in the art of poetry and the knowledge of the world, they should make it a point to study the utterances of the poet Somadeva

लोकवित्त्वे कवित्वे वा यदि चातुर्यचञ्चल । सोमदेवकवे सूक्ती समभ्यस्यन्तु साधवः ॥ 3 513

That Somadeva himself was conversant with the art of poetry as well as the way of the world, that he was a havi as well as a lokavind, a shrewd observer of contemporary society, is apparent from his works, and that is the highest compliment we can pay him. That this was considered high praise even in those times is shown by the fact that Jinasena in his Ādipurāṇa I 56 attributes these qualifications to his guru Virasena, the celebrated author of the Dhavalā commentary¹

Somadeva's self-assertion is in marked contrast to the modesty of an author like Siddharsi, who wrote his great allegorical romance about half a century before Yasastilaka was written². But it is noteworthy that in the opening verses of Yasastilaka Somadeva makes only modest claims in behalf of his work. He begins by saying that there is nothing that has not been visualized by the all but omniscient poets of old, and it is a miracle when a present-day poet, however sharp in intellect he may be, happens to make any utterance comparable to theirs (1 11)³. As regards his own Kāvya, he opines that it will create fun among the wicked, but will contribute towards the intellectual growth of the wise, while those who are impartial will not remain silent about the work. He hopes that the wise, whose sensibility has been made extremely dull by partaking of the excessive sweetness of the works of the meritorious poets, might have a liking for the utterances of poets like himself, just as they would relish Neem leaves after excessive indulgence in sweets (1 22-3)

Despite the all-round importance of Somadeva as a writer, he seems to have exercised very little influence in any department of thought outside the sphere of Jaina religious literature. He was completely ignored by the non-Jaina literati, and his literary rehabilitation is due to the interest taken in him by modern research. He seems to have found only one commentator for his Yasastilaka, the Jaina Śrutasāgara Sūri who wrote his works early in the 16th century¹. As regards Nītvākyaṃrta, there is an anonymous commentary extant on the work, of unknown date. It is, however, full of quotations from ancient writers on Smṛti and polity, and its author was a non-Jaina as he salutes Hari at the beginning of the work².

The literary fortunes of Somadeva are a sad commentary on how the achievement of a writer of genius can be neutralized by sectarian indifference and religious prejudices, but, as we shall see, Somadeva himself was imbued with such influences, and could hardly expect recognition outside the circle of his co-religionists. On matters relating to Jaina dogma he has always been recognised as an authoritative writer, and it is noteworthy that, in a number of verses quoted by Śrutasāgara in his commentary on Kundakunda's Bhāva-pāhuda (V 34), Somadeva is mentioned among the great teachers of Jainism.

Citations from Yasastilaka are often found in later Jaina literature, e.g., in Padmaprabha's commentary on Niyamasāra (v 101), Āśādhara's commentary on his Anagāra-dharmāmrta (2 75, 9 81, 98), Brahmadeva's commentary on Yogīndudeva's Paramātmaprakāśa (2 15), and frequently in 2 On the quotations in the Commentary, see O Stein's paper in the Ātmananda Centenary Commemoration Volume, Bhavangar 1936, pp 150-67. A commentary on Nītvākyaṃrta in Kannada by a Jaina author is known to exist. It was composed by Neminātha about the middle of the twelfth century A D. See Pt Premī (op cit), p. 80.

Śrutasāgara's commentary on the Prābhrtas of Kundakunda¹ The following verse of Yasastilaka (VIII 34) is found with a slight variation in Śivakoti's Ratnamālā,² this writer being different from the ancient author of that name.

सर्व एव हि जैनानां प्रमाणं लौकिको विधिः । यत्र सम्यक्त्वहानिर्न यत्र न व्रतदूषणम् ॥

The following three verses are cited from Yasastilaka VI 1 in Śubhacandra's Jñānārṇava (under 4 27).

ज्ञानहीने क्रिया पुंसि पर नारभते फलम् । तरोऽच्छायेव किं लभ्या फलश्रीर्नष्टदृष्टिभिः ॥

हृतं ज्ञानं क्रियाशून्यं हता चाज्ञानिनः क्रिया । धावन्नप्यन्धको नष्टं पश्यन्नपि च पङ्क्तुः ॥

It may be noted that the third verse does not belong to Somadeva, as it appears in his work as a quotation introduced by the phrase uktam ca. Another verse of Somadeva occurring in Yasastilaka VI 21 is quoted in Jñānārṇava (under 6 8) uktam ca granthāntare

मूढत्रयं मदाश्चाष्टौ तथानायतनानि षट् । अष्टौ शङ्कादयश्चेति दृग्दोषा पञ्चविंशतिः ॥³

Somadeva's verse

is quoted anonymously in Sarvadarśanasamgraha in the chapter on Jaina philosophy. A verse occurring in Yasastilaka in the philosophical dialogue towards the end of Book V (p 257) is quoted as follows in Anantavīrya's commentary on Parīkṣāmukhasūtra (Viśayasamuddeśa) tathā cōktam

तदहर्जस्तेनहातो रक्षोदृष्टेर्भवस्मृतेः । भूतानन्वयनात् सिद्धं प्रकृतिज्ञः सनातनः ॥ इति ।

Hiralal says in his Catalogue of Sanskrit and Prakrit manuscripts in C. P. and Berar (P XXXII) that 'in the Stotracaustayatikā Vidyānanda makes frequent references to and quotations from Dhyāna-paddhati of Somadeva Sūri. This may be another work by our author'. It is, however, possible that this Dhyāna-paddhati is not an independent work, but may turn out to be the elaborate discourse on meditation (Dhyānavidhi) in Yasastilaka VIII. 39.

As a poet, Somadeva's contribution to Kāvya literature is substantial enough to justify his claim to be regarded as a worthy successor of Māgha. The poetry of Yasastilaka has been analysed elsewhere¹, and it

1 Satprābhrtādi-samgrahaḥ, Mānikacandra Dīgambara Jaina Granthamālā, 17

2 Included in Siddhāntasārādi samgrahaḥ, Ibidem 22

3 It is uncertain whether the verses are actually quoted by the author of Jñānārṇava or merely occur in the manuscripts of the work. The Jñānārṇava is an original composition in fluent Sanskrit verse dealing with certain aspects of Jaina doctrine. A careful examination of the available manuscripts of the work will help to decide whether the quotations are genuine will be seen that Somadeva not only deals with the usual themes of Kāvya but adds to the rich fund of Sanskrit poetry by his treatment of topics not usually dealt with in Kāvya literature. He gives us vivid and intimate pictures of court life not found elsewhere, and their accuracy is apparently due to the fact that they are drawn from personal observation and experience. He depicts also other aspects of life, and among his most notable verses may be included those on child life, the cremation ground, and the goddess Candamāī. He is a sympathetic observer of animals, and some of his verses on animal life are among the best of their kind in Sanskrit literature. He has introduced Jaina religious themes into Kāvya poetry, and his verses on the Anupreksās are an important contribution to the literature on the subject. The use of Piākṛit metres in Sanskrit verse is also a noteworthy experiment, and Somadeva has in this connection made a lyrical effort which merits attention as being anterior to the composition of Jayadeva's Gītagovinda.

Perhaps the most interesting body of verse in Yaśastilaka is that dealing with the vices and foibles of the ministers of kings, and the verses in question, varied and extensive as they are, constitute the first systematic attempt at political satire in Sanskrit poetry, and remind us of the satirical verse of Ksemendra, who in his Narmamālā attacks the Kāyastha or the official caste of Kashmir. The later poet writes in a lighter vein, but his work is richer in concrete details, and covers a wider ground than the corresponding verses of Somadeva. The object of the latter is edification rather than entertainment, but from a historical point of view the observations of both the writers are important as throwing light on some of the abuses of the times. Somadeva may be said to have introduced in this respect a new theme in Sanskrit poetry, which was later developed with ampler details by Ksemendra.

Somadeva is not a great inspired poet. He is sometimes artificial and suffers from verbosity and repetition of ideas. But his verse often throbs with the currents of contemporary life, and he ranks supreme among the Jaina Sanskrit poets who have adopted the kāvya style as a vehicle of expression. He has, besides, given effective expression to some of the noble teachings of Jainism in Sanskrit verse. The subject has been treated in another chapter, but we may cite here a notable verse which enshrines the idea of returning good for evil.

तथापि सद्भिः प्रियमेव चिन्तनं न मत्थमानेऽप्यमृते विष हि ॥

‘Even if any one resorts to villainy from ignorance or evil motives, the good should think of doing only good Nectar never becomes poison even when it is churned’ (Yasastilaka, 1 151)

This is, indeed, not a new idea in Indian literature, and we may cite, for instance, the ancient Buddhist dictum Enmity is not calmed by enmity (na vaurena vaurāṇi sāmīyante)¹ Nevertheless it represents one of the cardinal teachings of Jainism, and the exhortation is in harmony with the love for all creatures inculcated elsewhere in Somadeva’s Yasastilaka.²

CHAPTER II

SYNOPSIS OF YAŚASTILAKA

Book I

In the Yaudheya country there was a beautiful city named Rājapura, adorned with magnificent temples and lofty mansions belonging to the wealthy. Here reigned Māradatta, son of Candamahāsena, a powerful Prince who surpassed in valour such kings of old as Nrga, Nala, Nahusa, Bharata, Bhagiratha and Bhagadatta Ascending the throne while still quite young, he embarked on a wild career of reckless adventure along with companions who had passions and traits of character similar to his own. Sometimes, putting on his armour, he would play with rogue elephants, ‘who had broken their chains like lotus fibres, flung away the pegs like sprouts of Vīrana grass, torn the ropes to pieces like branching creepers, and smashed the posts like reeds’. Sometimes he would pet vicious wild horses. Sometimes he would plunge into lakes and grapple crocodiles. Sometimes he would kill tigers with the force of his arms, and wander in the woods echoing with the uncanny screeching of owls in their mountain resort. Sometimes he would betake himself at night to cremation grounds, ‘terrible with the sound of the loud drums in the hands of the female goblins’, and engage in duels with powerful spirits and overthrow them in the encounter. But there was also a lighter side to his activities Like a veritable god of love, he enjoyed the company of the women of different nationalities, to wit, Andhra, Cola, Kerala, Simhala, Karnāta, Surāstra, Kamboja, Pallava and Kahnga Sometimes he dallied with young women in pleasure gardens, and, on other occasions, indulged in water-sports, surrounded by beautiful women, in artificial lakes, perfumed and abounding in flowers, with emerald floors, crystal embankments, golden steps and islets of pearls. Although reckless and self-willed, and addicted to wine, hunting, and courtesans, Māradatta was free from dangers and calamities, and considered himself akin to the gods

One day a Tantric teacher named Vīrabhairava told him that he would obtain a miraculous sword with which he could conquer the realm of the Vidyādharas, if only creatures of all kinds were sacrificed in the temple of the goddess Candamāī in his capital, and if at the same time he killed with his own hands a couple of human beings possessing all auspicious physical characteristics. Hearing this, Māradatta summoned the entire population to the temple of the dread goddess under the pretext of celebrating the Mahānavamī festival, although it was not the proper season for it, and himself repaired to the shrine and ordered the guards to fetch the required couple of human beings for the purpose of sacrifice

The temple of Candamāī was a horrid place, frequented by the terrible female spirits known as the Mahāyoginīs, and a crowd of fanatical votaries, engaged in outrageous forms of self-torture. Certain devotees were burning Guggula incense on their heads, some, extremely ferocious, were burning their arteries, like lights, while others, exceedingly bold, were trying to please Śiva by drinking their own blood. In one corner, Kāpālikas were selling for a price pieces of flesh cut off from their own bodies,¹ and at another place certain fanatics were worshipping the Mothers by swinging from their intestines, extracted with their own hands. Elsewhere certain grim men were offering their own flesh as an oblation in the sacred fire. Such was the temple of Candamāī, terrifying to Death himself.

Meanwhile, the Jaina sage Sudatta, famous for his austerities, and unaffected by the rigours of the winter and the summer and the monsoon, was approaching Rājapura with a large number of disciples. Avoiding the city in view of the impending slaughter, and turning to the east, he saw a beautiful pleasure garden where young men were disporting themselves with beautiful damsels, adorned with floral ornaments. But he said to himself thus

प्रायः प्राप्तसमाधिमुद्धमनसोऽप्येते प्रदेशाः क्षणात्, स्वान्तर्धान्तकृतो भवन्ति तदिह स्थातुं न युक्तं यतेः ॥ 1. 71.

1 See Chap. XIII.

"Such places, like the hours of moonrise, occasion gossip about the amours of the beautiful women of all the world. Like the spring, they provide free scope for mundane joys in which the sentiment of love prevails. Such places, as a rule, delude in a moment the heart even of one whose mind is purified by deep concentration. So it is not meant for an ascetic to remain here."

Going a few steps further, the sage saw a cremation ground with the funeral pyres fiercely burning, and the gruesome scene of desolation awakened diverse thoughts in his mind. He moved further away, and came to a hill not far from Rājapura. Here he fixed his camp and ordered the monks to beg for alms in the neighbouring villages.

Among the disciples of Sudatta were two young ascetics, a boy and a girl, brother and sister, named Abhayaruci and Abhayamati respectively, who, unlike the others, were directed to beg in the city. They were the twin children of Kusumāvalī, sister of Māradatta, and chief queen of Yeśomati, son of Yaśodhara Mahārāja, and had taken the monastic vow in early childhood and wandered with the sage Sudatta. On their way to the city they were encountered by the guards, who had been sent in quest of a couple of human victims for the impending sacrifice. Careful not to frighten the young persons, the guards told them in a friendly manner that a great teacher, who had been apprised of their arrival, was waiting to see them in the temple of Bhavānī. Their frightful appearance, however, betrayed their real purpose, and the boy and the girl, resigning themselves to their fate, followed them to the temple of the goddess.

The temple of Candamārī, which was known as Mahābhairava, presented a strange spectacle, being full of the victims of all kinds brought there for sacrifice, and held fast by armed guards resembling the attendants of Śiva. There could be seen sheep, buffaloes, camels, elephants and horses frightened by the half-brandished swords of the keepers. There were aquatic animals like crocodiles, alligators, frogs, crabs, tortoises, and Pāthina fish, all trembling with fear at the sight of the spirits waiting to drink their blood. The keepers were at pains to hold together the numerous birds, scared by the movements of the circular sacrificial blade, and the other victims such as antelopes, tigers, lions, wolves, boars and apes. The mass slaughter of the animals was to take place after the king had sacrificed the first victims.

The young ascetics saw before them the grim figure of Māradatta. Standing on the floor of the temple, with drawn sword, he looked like a mountain in the middle of a river, with a serpent with raised hood on its slope. The king 'seemed to be aflame with his valour flaring up in his inner being, and burn everything with his angry look. He was extremely ferocious like a venomous serpent, and seemed to consume everything with the fury of his deportment. The aspect and character of the goddess were still more terrible

The young ascetics whose minds were bent on the highest beatitude were not in the least afraid of the danger before them, and never lost their balance and composure when ushered into the presence of the king in the grim setting of the temple of Candamārī. They encouraged each other to be firm and resolute, scorn death, and regard salvation as the highest object of human endeavour. Māradata's heart softened at the sight of the tender boy and the girl, and although he could not recognise them to be his own nephew and niece, he felt the kindly influence of their presence, and said to himself (p. 156)

“कथं नामैतद्दर्शनादाचान्तामृतमिव नृशंसाशयबहलकालुष्यमपि मुहुः प्रशान्तं मे चेत, चक्षुः पुनः कुलिश-
कीलितमिव कथं न विषयान्तरमवगाहते, चिरप्रवसितप्रणयिजनावलोकनादिव कथमयमात्मा परमन्तर्मोदते, चित्तमपि चेदं

प्रायेण प्रातस्तपनतेजासीव रागोल्बणवयासि ।”

“How is it that, at the sight of these two, my heart, though heavily tainted by cruel thoughts, has become absolutely calm, as if it had partaken of nectar, and my eyes turn to no other object, as if because riveted upon them with the force of thunder? Why is my soul in an ecstasy of joy, as if at the sight of beloved friends who have been long abroad? Why is my heart steeped in joy, as if it were long familiar with them? Are they not possibly my own nephew and niece? Only the other day I heard from one of the elders of my family, Revataka by name, the amazing story of their religious austerities even in childhood. At the sight of beloved persons, though never seen before, the senses become suffused with youth in an ecstasy of love, like the rays of the morning sun.”

Observing the change in the attitude of the king, a bard recited two verses and appealed to him to lay aside his sword.

गाढं मुष्टिनिपीडनश्रमभरोद्धान्तधाराजलां मुञ्चत्वाहवकेलिदोःसहचरीं तत्सङ्गयष्टिं भवान् ॥ 1. 148.

‘No enemies are near at hand, none transgresses thy command. Sire, the goddess of prosperity is devoted to thee, and no one is jealous of her. Do thou therefore discard thy sword, the companion of thy arm in the sport of war its blade doth emit its lustre under the pressure of thy powerful grip!"

Māradatta listened to the verses recited by the bard, and laid down his sword at the feet of the goddess. Then imposing silence on the noisy crowd of spectators with his raised hand, he offered a seat to the ascetic boy and the girl, who now recited, one after the other, a series of panegyrics in honour of the king in the conventional style of court poetry.

The purpose of the ascetic boy was to convert the king to the Jaina faith; but he thought it advisable to proceed slowly and cautiously in the matter, and reflected within himself (p. 176)

“रजस्तमो बहुलेषु च प्राणिषु प्रथमतरमेव बर्मेपदेश करोति महतीं शिरश्चलव्ययाम्, भवति चावधीरणाय वक्तुः, तदेनमभ्यस्तरसप्रसरैरेव वचोभिरुल्लासयामि, नयवेदिनो हि वनगज इव स्वादुक्फलप्रलोभनमविदिततत्त्वे पुंस्ति छन्दानुवर्तनमपि भवत्यायत्यामभिमतावाप्तये।”

“Preaching of religion at the very outset to persons, dominated by passion and ignorance, only gives them a severe headache, and brings the speaker into contempt. So I will cheer him with words enlivened by such sentiments as are familiar to him. A sagacious person ultimately obtains the desired result with regard to one who is ignorant of the truth, even by humouring him, just as one subdues a wild elephant by alluring him with delicious fruits.”

The ascetic boy, followed by his companion, again praised the king in a series of lyrical verses, and the latter now questioned them about their native place and origin. The boy promised to satisfy the king's curiosity and addressed to him a benedictory verse.

Book II

The ascetic boy Abhayaruci, addressing Māradatta, now begins the story of his previous births, an autobiographical record, which incidentally throws interesting light on medieval court life in India.

There is a prosperous country named Avanti, hospitable with its fruit-trees, lotus-pools and vernal bowers

मागोपांतवनद्रुमावलिदलच्छायापनीतातपा पूर्णभ्यर्णसरोऽवतीर्णपवनव्याधूतदेहश्रमा ।

“There the travellers wear beautiful unsteady wreaths of toy-lotus blossoms, and are protected from the sun by the shade of the leaves of the woodland trees alongside the roads. Their fatigue is removed by the breezes coming from the neighbouring pools of water, full to the brim; and delighted with the flowers, and contented with the fruits, they indulge in sports in the waters ”

In that country was the famous city of Ujjayinī where reigned a great king named Yaśorgha “The Mandara mountain gave him the quality of firmness, the ocean gave him depth, the god of love gave him beauty, Bīhaspatī gave him mastery of traditional lore, the Kalpa tree made him accessible to suppliants, the Earth gave him the virtue of forbearance, and the sky gave him dignity The goddess of speech gave him eloquence, the goddess of wealth gave him success in the art of commanding the Cintāmanī gem gave him intellectual power, and the family goddess gave him physical fitness, while the god of death gave him the power of bringing all men under his control. In this way, other deities, too such as Vaiṇa and Kuberā, gave him their essential qualities, like ancestral wealth (p. 218).”

Candramatī was the consort of Yaśorgha, and is no other than the ascetic girl Abhayamatī in her present birth Yaśodhara was the son of Yaśorgha and Candramatī, and is no other than the ascetic boy himself in his present birth¹ One day king Yaśorgha happened to see a growth of grey hair on his head, and immediately his thoughts turned to renunciation of worldly ties, and he revolved in his mind the twelve topics of meditation prescribed by the Jaina faith, commonly known as the Anupreksās. Thereafter the king gave orders for the marriage and coronation of his son Yaśodhara, and himself renounced the world and took the monastic vow under the direction of a learned sage named Śamyamadhara Pratāpavardhana, the chief of the army, with the help of an architect, made the requisite preparations for the coronation A blanch city with spacious avenues was built on the bank of the Sipiṛā as well as a bejewelled pavilion, protected from the sun by beautiful curtains, and equipped with numerous gates, towers, altars and apartments. Round about were the camps of the princes who had come to witness the festival

The selection of a suitable elephant and a horse for the new king was the next important item preliminary to the coronation Under instructions from Pratāpavardhana, a committee of experts selected an elephant named Udayagiri from among those sent by the king of Kalinga as part of his annual tribute, and the chief keeper of the royal elephants communicated to Yaśodhara the findings of the experts, an elaborate report on the characteristics of the chosen animal, full of technical details. Meanwhile, a bard named Karikalabha recited a number of verses in praise of elephants. Similarly, a notable white charger of Kamboja was selected by another committee of experts, whose report was likewise communicated to the Prince by the keeper of the royal stable, Śālihotra, after which a bard named Vāṇinodamakaranda recited some verses in praise of horses.

The astrologers then reported to Yaśodhara that the coronation might follow the marriage rites, or the marriage rites the coronation, or if the time was favourable, both the functions might take place together; just as an idol could be installed after the building of a temple, or a temple built after the installation of an idol, or if one's resources permitted, the building and the installation could proceed together. The astrologers described in detail the time and hour technically favourable for both the coronation and the marriage rites.

Yaśodhara proceeded to the coronation pavilion where gold and silver pitchers, various herbs and Kuśa blades, and water from ocean-going rivers were kept ready. The royal throne, the white umbrella, and the fly-whisks added to the beauty of the structure, and the arms and the family treasures were carefully arranged near the idol of the tutelary goddess. Auspicious utterances were made by gay women, and crowds kept at a distance by trustworthy officers. Here, to the accompaniment of music, the sacred water was poured over Yaśodhara by a bevy of courtesans, while a bard named Jalakelvilāsa recited verses celebrating the ceremonial bath.

The ceremonial bath was followed by the marriage rites. Attended by the family priest, Yaśodhara worshipped the blazing Fire with butter mixed with curds, and curds mixed with boiled milk, while other priests offered oblations in the fire and uttered blessings with appropriate formulas. The marriage of Yaśodhara and Amitamati was celebrated in prose and verse by the bard Manojakuñjara.

Next came the ceremony of coronation, of which the principal feature was the presentation of the royal insignia to the prince, while relevant verses were uttered by the bards. The white umbrella was presented first, and Yaśodhara was asked to ascend the throne. Then followed the presentation of the royal turban and the sword.

After the coronation, Yaśodhara and his bride mounted the elephant Udayagiri, and the royal procession started from the bank of the Sīprā on its way to the capital. Trustworthy followers, equipped with armour, and others armed with swords guarded the king, while attendants, wielding various weapons, cleared the road and removed inauspicious persons such as women in periods, eunuchs, men with deformities, Cāndālas and the like. The elders recited congratulatory verses, and women sang to the flute and the lyre. The neighing of horses and the trumpeting of elephants mingled with the sound of drums.

The procession passed through the streets of the decorated city, the terraces and windows of the buildings being crowded with women eager to have a look at the royal pair. Meanwhile, in the palace, the aged lady superintendents of the royal household were stirring up the maids and attendants with admonitions and directions preparatory to the reception of the king. The frivolous maid Vasantikā was, for instance, asked to have done with the gamblers and make garlands of Bakula buds. Lavangī was ordered not to join her playmates, but to get busy in making 'ornamental designs on the floor' (rangavallī)¹. Madanā was asked if she was sleeping even at that hour, and told to make preparations for the ceremonial waving of lights. Kurangī was ordered to prepare cosmetics, and Mālātī to decorate the throne, while Kalahamsī was urged to get the betel-stand ready, and Madhukarī the flywhisks. The eunuch was advised to step aside, the Kīrāta to remain indoors, the hunchback to do auspicious acts, the dwarf to indulge in sports, and the chamberlain to set about his business in right earnest, and even the tame birds were asked to put forth joyous notes. On arrival at the palace, bedecked with white flags, the king was welcomed by the bard Kirtisāhara with a poetical description of the noble edifice.

Book III

The narrative continues in the form of an autobiographical record and describes Yaśodhara's life as a king, but it is by no means a continuous account, being rather a series of episodes incidental to the routine of a medieval court. They are here enumerated in the order in which they occur in text.

α) Yaśodhara is awakened from sleep by bards reciting verses descriptive of the morning scenery, after which the king goes to his durbar to dispense justice with the help of learned and impartial judges, while erudite scholars expound the law-books.

1 Called also rangāvālī and rangarekhā, and made with coloured powder, also with camphor dust, and even with pulverized pearls and gems. b) The relative merits of fate and personal endeavour form the subject of an academical discussion in the council-chamber, in which the ministers maintain different points-of-view, and the deliberation ends with a discourse on the principles which ought to govern the relations of a king with other kings.

c) An arrogant message in verse summoning rival princes to accept the suzerainty of Yaśodhara is read out to the envoy in charge of the mission by the royal clerk under the king's direction

d) The chief of the secret police reports to Yaśodhara that the spy Śankhanaka has returned after gathering information about various people in the country and abroad. Yaśodhara summons the spy to his presence and spends some time, jesting with him. Questioned by the king about the absence of his former corpulence, Śankhanaka replies that poor men like himself can hardly expect to have protuberant bellies. It is, of course, otherwise with men like Yaśodhara and the idle rich, who daily gorge themselves with luxurious food, such as rice white and clear like the glances of beautiful women, broths of the colour gold, butter fragrant as the mouth of a beloved woman, curries charming as the graceful movements of nautch girls, well-cooked dishes, savoury like a beloved woman's lips, curds well-shaped and hard like the breasts of a young woman, milk sweet as the glances of one's beloved, sugared preparations of milk-rice, delicious as the first union with a newly-married bride, and water perfumed with camphor, refreshing as the mysteries of love!

Addressed by the king as 'the lord of the rams,' and asked whether he has had anything to eat, Śankhanaka replies that he has been in a way entertained by a miserly, penniless and greedy fellow named Kiliñjaka, the righthand man of the Chief of the Secret Agents, Viśvāvasu, a native of the Deccan. The meal consisted of boiled rice grown stale, and full of husk and gravel, some rotten beans, a few drops of rancid Atasī oil, slices of half-cooked gourds and certain badly cooked vegetables as well as some raw fruits and overbrowned binjals thrown in. The meal ended with sour gruel mixed with plenty of mustards, and the beverage was some alkaline fluid with a taste like that of the water of a salt-mine. Śankhanaka pitifully relates that he could eat nothing and remained hungry, and his only subsistence was a quantity of boiled Śyāmāka rice mixed with whey, which the miser's wife had the goodness to serve, unseen by her husband.

Yaśodhara once asked the spy for particulars about a minister named Pāmarodāra, entrusted with the administration of a province, and famous for his piety, wisdom and spotless character. This brings us to what may be termed a detailed report of the spy on the doings of the minister.

Śankhanaka promises to speak the truth, but warns the king that what he is going to relate will to some extent put a slur upon him as well. It is the master's fault if his servants do as they like through a sense of their own power and influence.

The spy goes on to quote a large number of verses on the evil ways of ministers, composed by various poets by way of criticizing the king's failure to investigate the misdeeds of Pāmarodāra. The verses are mostly general in character, but a few directly attack the offending minister.

Śankhanaka gives an idea of Pāmarodāra's administration by saying that the latter demands unpaid labour when the people are busy sowing, and collects taxes before the corn is ripe, while the harvest is spoilt by the unlicensed movements of the soldiery.

The revelation of the spy is a rude shock to Yaśodhara who is unwilling to believe his allegations, but Śankhanaka replies that, in all matters beyond the range of direct perception, a king must depend upon spies as well as his own judgment, as if they were his eyes. He quotes a verse to the effect that when a king does not employ spies nor exercise his own judgment, his kingdom is at the mercy of his ministers, just as the milk belonging to a blind man becomes the prey of cats.

The low origin of Pāmarodāra is described as the cause of his overweening pride. His father was an oilman and mother a low-born woman, while his wife has had five husbands! The respect shown to such a man on account of his rank was bound to make him proud and overbearing. The spy then illustrates by various examples the danger to kings from elevating low-born persons to high positions in the state.

Describing Pāmarodāra as a monster of corruption, to wit, bribery and extortion, the spy tells Yaśodhara that the minister, after cheating him, as he did the former kings, will one day go over to some other king, like a trumpeter who serves any one employing him.

अपि त्वामतिवाह्येष यथातीतान् महीपतीन् । त्रीवान्याश्रयस्थायी लज्जालुब्धानिशाचरः ॥ 3. 185.

Pāmarodāra's 'valour' is next described. He is brave and valiant in the presence of merchants, physicians, the weak and the deformed, but, like an ape, maintains a discreet silence in the presence of warriors and desperadoes.

वणिजि च भिषजि च शूर शौण्डीरो दुर्बले च विकले च । कपिरिव निमृतस्तिष्ठति रणशौण्डे चण्डदण्डे च ॥ 3. 190.

Speaking of the origin of villains, Śankhanaka relates that, in days of yore, there came into being fourteen, or rather eighteen, groups of them. He declares that the king's minister combines in himself the vices of all the categories of villains enumerated by him.

After quoting some verses attributed to different poets, and containing reflections on Pāmarodāra's character, the spy represents him as an enemy of religion. He misappropriates money donated for the worship of the gods, and breaks or melts down valuable idols and replaces them by others of lesser value. Sometimes he would sell an idol, and, with the proceeds, celebrate a religious festival. It is also his habit to rob people by employing the methods of thugs, and give the money to worthy Brāhmanas. Besides, he confiscates villages and property endowed for the purpose of maintaining the worship of the gods¹.

देवद्रविणादाता देवद्रोहाच्च देवनिर्माता । अहह खर खलु संप्रति धर्मपरं पामरोदार ॥ 3 227.

विक्रीय देवं विदधाति यात्रां तद्दालनादेव पराश्र देवान् ।

अग्रहारग्रहं साक्षाद्देवभोगभुजगमः । शिष्टविष्टपसंहारप्रलयानलमानसः ॥ 3 236

Crime and irreligion play their part in a more serious charge brought against the minister. The latter had employed five Cāndālas, knowing them to be such, in his household for cooking and drawing water, but this violation of the caste-rules gave rise to a scandal, and one night he murdered them all while they were fast asleep. When it was suggested by some distinguished person that he should perform purificatory rites to expiate the crime, he ridiculed the idea by putting forward heterodox opinions, commonly associated with the Cārvākas.

रविरश्मिरत्नपावकमाहेयीवायवोऽन्यजैः स्पृष्टाः । न हि दुष्टास्तद्बद्धा प्रकृतिशुचिर्मालमध्येऽपि ॥

आत्मा स्वभावशुद्धः कायः पुनरशुचिरेष च निसर्गात् । प्रावृत्तिविधानं कस्येति विचिन्त्यता जगति ॥

वर्णाश्रमजातिकुलस्थितिरेषा देवसंवृतिर्नान्या । परमार्थतश्च नृपते को विप्रः कश्च चाण्डालः ॥ 3 232-4

"The rays of sun, jewels, fire, cows and air are not polluted when touched by Cāndālas. Similarly, being pure by nature, I could not be contaminated even in the midst of Cāndālas. The soul is pure by nature, while the body is naturally impure. Think over the matter. To whom, in the world, does the process of purification apply? Sure, the regulation of castes and orders of society and birth and family is a matter of convention and nothing more. In reality, O king, there is neither Brāhmana nor Cāndāla."

Further charges against Pāmarodāra are contained in a verse which describes the harm done by the minister to certain scholars and poets. He destroyed the livelihood of a scholar named Tridaśa, and caused financial loss to (the poet) Kohala. He insulted the poet Ganapati, and brought about the ruin of (the scholar) Śamkara. He outraged the religious susceptibilities of the scholar Kumuda, and compelled (the poet) Kekat to leave the country

The spy concludes by saying that the religious merit of a king and the joy and happiness of his friends and servants depend upon the removal of wicked ministers; but we are left in the dark about what steps, if any, were taken against Pāmarodāna.

e) Yaśodhara reviews his army on the eve of an expedition, and the different regiments recruited from various parts of India are described to him by the military commanders¹

f) The Sandhivigrahins or Secretaries for peace and war announce in verse the arrival of the envoys of various monarchs at the court of Yaśodhara g) Utterances of the court jester h) Yaśodhara discusses Arthaśāstra verses i) Yaśodhara says that he sometimes witnessed exhibitions of dances in dancing halls in the company of connoisseurs of the art We have in this connection a hymn to Sarasvatī forming part of the Pūrvavanga ceremony j) Yaśodhara wounds the vanity of a tactless and self-conceited poet k) Yaśodhara takes part in philosophical discussions l) Stick in hand, Yaśodhara trains elephants, and while in training, the animal is addressed in prose and verse, the elaborate prose invocations ending with the words he he hala dvayasāmya mātṛāsataṁ tistha tistha The following is one of the verses containing the instructions of the trainer (3. 282)

गात्रैस्तिष्ठ समैः पुरोऽनखसमं हस्तं निधेहि क्षितौ दृष्टिं देहि कराग्रतः स्थिरमना कर्णौ गजाश्लेषय ।

m) Yaśodhara reports that once during an inspection of different categories of elephants, a military commander enumerated to him the various states of intoxication in which rutting elephants are found. It was also his custom to witness the sports of elephants from a special pavilion in the race-course, accompanied by experts conversant with the different methods of treating elephants during their period of frenzy On such occasions keepers used to delight him by reciting verses in praise of the animals. Sometimes, again, he supervised the process of armouring the tusks of his war-elephants with protective sheaths of iron n) Yaśodhara listens to a lecture on health and dietetics

o) Yaśodhara says that he passed the hours of noon in the hot summer days in amorous sports in his garden called Madanamadavinoda 'The Frenzied gaiety of love', and indulged in water-sports with his mistresses in the Hall of Mechanical Showers (yanti adhā āgṛha), 'cooler than the Himālayas'. We find here 'watery beds' on the raised floor of pavilions erected on islets on the surface of pools for water-sports, vessels of gold, gems and silver containing scented water, ground lotus-beds watered by showers from 'mechanical clouds', streams of water gushing from the mouths of the statues of various wild animals, currents of water issuing from the holes of artificial lotus stalks made of moonstones, sprays emitted by the trunks of artificial elephants, fountains rising from the mouths of artificial alligators, and water let loose from the mouths of artificial monkeys placed in creepery recesses. What seems to be a statuary group represents water deities quairrelling in the course of their water-sports, the sage Nārada dancing in joy at the sight, and the Seven Sages hurrying to the scene, the figures of the latter spouting a copious flood of water. We see also handfuls of water thrown up by the statues of nymphs, seated on the trunks of artificially made Celestial Trees, while water for bath comes pouring from the bosoms of mechanical 'cloud-puppets'. Another mechanical device is the decorated figure of a woman, which discharges streams of liquid sandal when pressed on different parts of the body (3 375)

p) Once in the rainy season, while Yaśodhara was enjoying the beauty of the clouds from a palace on the slope of a pleasure hill, accompanied by his tributaries and warriors, the Sandhivigrahin ushered into his presence an envoy and a messenger from the court of Acala, the king of Pañcāla, with symbolic presents conveying a threat of war. This causes considerable excitement and commotion in the court of Yaśodhara, and ultimately a letter is sent to the king of Pañcāla, demanding submission.¹ q) At the advent of autumn, war is declared against the king of Pañcāla, and an expedition sent against him under the command of Vijayavardhana. Winter comes, and at the dead of night a spy arrives to announce to Yaśodhara the victory of his commander-in-chief and the defeat of Acala.

r) Spring arrives, and Yaśodhara participates in the festivities of the season. While the bards recite verses describing the glory of the spring and the vernal attitude of the king and the gaily decorated swings in the royal household, Yaśodhara worships the god of love and celebrates the festival in his honour.

1) See Chap. V.

s) The spring festivities are followed by the Mahānavamī in the course of which the goddess Aparājītā is worshipped. Then comes the Festival of Light (dīpotsava). After this, Yaśodhara practises archery, while a bard recites verses in praise of his skill in shooting with bow and arrows. t) Moonrise and the gaiety of love

Book IV

Yaśodhara now turns to his domestic affairs, and relates an episode of his married life, which is the pivotal point of the story

One evening Yaśodhara visited his consort Amītamātī to pass the night with her in her apartments on the top floor of a seven storied palace. About midnight the king, who was not quite asleep, noticed that the queen slipped away from his bed, and, furtively looking at him, discarded her ornaments, and, putting on the clothes of her maid, quickly went out of the chamber. The king's suspicion was aroused, and he at once followed her close on her heels, and saw her entering the hut of an elephant-driver named Astavanka, an ugly cripple, who was fast asleep in a miserable bed, resting his head on a pile of ropes. Amītamātī sat down near him, and took hold of his hands, but he was furious at her delay in coming to him, and, dragging her by the hair with the left hand, gave her blows with the other. The queen was profuse in her apologies and confession of love, and swore by the goddess Kātyāyanī that she was thinking only of him even when in the company of Yaśodhara. The latter was observing the scene unseen, and was about to draw his sword to strike the guilty pair, but restrained himself, thinking of the resulting scandal and the grief the young prince Yaśomati would feel at the death of his mother. Yaśodhara then returned to the palace, and Amītamātī, too, stealthily came and quietly lay down beside him as if nothing had happened.

Yaśodhara could hardly sleep, and was filled with anguish and disgust, and felt abhorrence not only for Amītamātī but for women in general. He was puzzled at the queen's strange infatuation with a low-born elephant-driver, but remembered that the cripple was an expert singer, reputed to be able to make even withered trees put forth new shoots with the melody of his voice, and that songs had a ravishing effect upon women who were apt to be bewitched by a singer, however wretched or ugly he might be.

Yaśodhara continued to reflect on the conduct of Amītamātī, and the more he brooded over it, the greater became his disgust for women and worldly pleasures, and he made up his mind to renounce the world, leaving the throne to his son Yaśomati. Next morning he appeared in court, and was there joined by his mother Candramātī. A bard recited some verses which seemed to reflect the king's own thoughts at the moment (p 84)

त्व मन्दिरद्रविणदारतनूद्वाद्यैस्तृष्णातमोभिरनुबन्धिभिरम्बुद्धि ।

क्षिप्त्वास्यहर्निशमिमं न तु चित्त वेत्सि दण्ड यमस्य निपतन्तमकाण्ड एव ॥

'Deluded by the ever-recuring darkness of desires such as those relating to home, wealth, wife and children, thou dost suffer day and night, o mind, but reckest not of the suddenly arriving scourge of Death''

The bard recited another verse on the futility of trying to keep women under control, and it seemed to Yaśodhara as if the bard had come to know of the events of the previous night Candramati also noticed the change in her son's demeanour, and had misgivings about his relations with Amitamati, who, she thought, had been given much more freedom than was good for a woman She remembered also that a maid-servant had reported to her that her daughter-in-law was in the habit of casting affectionate glances at the elephant driver Nevertheless she asked Yaśodhara the reason of his dejection and restlessness, but he told her a concocted story about having seen a dream, in which he appeared to renounce the world and retire to the woods, after having put Prince Yaśomati on the throne Candramati advised her son not to have any faith in dreams, and told him the story of the teacher, who had dreamt of his school as being full of sweetmeat balls, and, relying on his dream, invited the king to a luxurious repast' She further related that the maid-servant Vasantikā had just reported to her that in a dream seen by her she had turned into rice gruel, and was being eaten up by the Brāhmins invited to the śrāddha of her deceased mother' After thus demonstrating the fantastic character of dreams, Candramati suggested that, if Yaśodhara was really apprehensive of having seen an evil dream, he should seek a remedy by sacrificing all kinds of animals to the tutelary goddess, and perform the customary rites to counteract the evil

Yaśodhara was shocked at the idea of sacrificing animals, and his heart revolted against the use of animal flesh in the worship of the gods As he made no attempt to conceal his feeling of revulsion at the course of action suggested by his mother, the latter attributed his heterodox leanings to the insidious influence of the Jainas, and accused the courtiers of disloyalty and corruption for allowing her simple-minded son to associate with the Digambaras, who, like magicians, were so skilled in deluding the world' An animated discussion ensued between mother and son on such controversial topics as animal sacrifice and various other Brāhmanical tenets and practices, which were subjected to adverse criticism by Yaśodhara. While Candramati exhorted the latter to worship Śiva or Viṣṇu or the sun, he picked holes in the Brāhmanical religion, and sought to establish the antiquity and prestige of the Jaina faith by citing various texts in support of his thesis

Candramatī felt herself to be woisted in the argument, and ultimately persuaded Yasodhara in the name of filial piety to accept a compromise, whereby he would sacrifice to the tutelary goddess a cock made out of flour, and partake of the offering, imagining it to be flesh. While orders were given to make such a cock and decorate the temple of the goddess, Amrtamati came to know of the happenings at the court, and at once realised that the story of the dream was only a feint, and that she had been detected in her escapade of the previous night. She decided to act quickly, and made up her mind to strike Yasodhara before he could strike her. Accordingly, she sent to him the minister Gavisthva with a message, declaring her willingness to sacrifice herself before the goddess in order to counteract the evil effect of the king's dream and ensure his safety. Furthermore, she begged that should the king decide to renounce the world, she might be permitted to accompany him to the woods, like the devoted wives of old, such as Sitā, Draupadī, Arundhatī and others. Meanwhile, she invited Yasodhara and his mother to a banquet in her house after the worship of the goddess was over. Yasodhara accepted the invitation and sent back the queen's minister.

The treachery and hypocrisy of Amrtamati served only to deepen Yasodhara's hatred of her, but still he decided to abide by his promise to eat in her house. Meanwhile, the sound of music accompanying the dance of courtesans in the streets announced to the citizens that Candramatī and her retinue were on their way to the temple of Candikā, and Yasodhara also started for the same place on the back of an elephant amidst a host of evil omens. Arriving at the temple, he severed the head of the cock made out of dough with a knife, according to the instructions of the priests, praying to the goddess that the offering might produce for him the same results as the actual killing of animals in sacrifices. He then sent the dough, from which the cock was fashioned, to the kitchen, as if it were the flesh of a real cock.

Next day, Yasodhara, accompanied by his mother, son and daughter-in-law, dined in Amrtamati's house. But she had mixed the food served out to her husband and mother-in-law with poison, which at once took effect and imperilled their lives. Physicians were sent for, and the inmates went about looking for medicine. Meanwhile, Amrtamati cried aloud, and feigning to droop on Yasodhara's bosom, strangled him to death. The mother also died.

Book V

The ascetic boy describes the rebirths of Yaśodhara and his mother Candramatī after their tragic death

a) Yaśodhara was reborn in a family of peacocks inhabiting a large tree in a well-watered valley to the north-east of the Suvela mountain. There he was caught by a hunter and presented to Yaśomatī, who had ascended the throne after Yaśodhara's death. The peacock miraculously remembered the events of his former birth, and recognised the old scenes and associates as soon as he entered the city of Ujjayinī and saw the royal palace

सैवेयं नगरी तदेव भवनं ता एव केलीधरा सैवैषा वनभू स एव सरसीसारे विलासाचल ।

सैवासौ वनिता स एव तनयस्ते चैव मे बान्धवाश्चित्रं केवलमेक एव हि कथं जातोऽहमन्याकृतिः ॥

Meanwhile, Candramatī was reborn as a dog in a cowherd settlement in Karahāta, a country lying to the south of the Vindhya mountain. It so happened that the dog was also presented by the owner to the king, who was glad to receive so fine an animal for his hunting excursions

One day the peacock wandered to the seventh floor of the royal palace, and discovered Amrtamatī dallying with her paramour, the cripple. The peacock became mad with rage and attacked the pair with his beak, wings and throat. The serving maids saw this, and raising a hue and cry, struck the bird with whatever they found ready to hand, caskets, canes, fans and shoes. The dog, too, came and rushed upon the bird and killed him. The king, who was playing a game of dice nearby, saw the dog attacking the peacock, and dealt a blow at the animal with the board, killing him outright.

b) In the next birth Yaśodhara became a stag and Candramatī a serpent. On the very day of his birth, the former developed a taste for snake's flesh, and discovered the serpent while digging up ant-hills with his horns. He at once started to devour the reptile, but the hoarse sound emanating from his throat, gorged with snake's flesh, awakened a hyena asleep in a neighbouring grove of Kadamba trees, and the stag in his turn became the hyena's prey.

c) Yaśodhara was then reborn as a huge fish and Candramatī as a crocodile in the Sipiā. One day, during the water-sports of the women of Ujjayinī in the river, a maid of the royal household was seized by the crocodile, and Yaśomatī, in anger, ordered the fishermen to destroy all dangerous animals in the river. They at once got into all kinds of fishing craft, and in the course of the operation, the crocodile was pierced in the throat by a spear, and the fish, too, caught in a net. Both of them were brought ashore, and ordered by the king to be made over to the cook of a hospice for Brāhmins. Everyday slices from their bodies were cooked and served to the inmates until they both expired after prolonged sufferings.

d) After this, Yaśodhara and Candiamatī were reborn as a pair of goats in a herd of sheep in the village of Kankāhī, near Ujjayinī. One day, while the male goat (Yaśodhara) was covering the female, the herd got scared, and the leader of the rams attacked the billy-goat with his horns. The goat died, but was reborn in the womb of the she-goat. One day Yaśomatī came there on a hunting expedition, accompanied by a large number of hunters, but unable to kill any game in the woods, he returned, angry and disgruntled, and while passing through the herd, hit the she-goat (Candiamatī) with an arrow, ripped open her belly, and found the kid in the womb.

The young goat was entrusted to the care of the chief cook, and passed a few months in the royal kitchen. There he saw Amrtamatī teaching the cooks how to roast meat, but she had been stricken with leprosy in consequence of her sins, and her loathsome body emitted so foul a smell that the attendants had to go about, covering their noses. Besides, the maids used to point at her mockingly, and tell passers-by how she had administered poison to her husband, the great and good Yaśodhara.

Meanwhile, the she-goat, after her death, was reborn as a buffalo in Kalinga. Purchased by the owner of a caravan, the animal came in course of time to Ujjayinī, and used to swim in the Sīprā. One day he happened to meet Yaśomatī's horse, and immediately made a murderous attack on the latter, owing to the innate mutual hostility of the two species of animals. As a punishment, the buffalo was tortured to death under the orders of the king. The young goat, too, was killed for the table of Amrtamatī who was inordinately fond of meat.

e) Yaśodhara and his mother Candramatī were next reborn as a cock and a hen, but there is a prelude to the story.

A sage named Manmathamathana was engaged in deep meditation on the Vijayārdha mountain. A Vidyādhara named Kandalavilāsa, who was going over the mountain in his aerial car, was ashamed to find that the motion of the vehicle was checked by the mystic force of the sage. By way of retaliation, the Vidyādhara decided to exercise his own magical powers to interrupt the meditation of the sage, and conjured up a scene of terror, by producing torrential rain, hail-stones and hurricanes, and a crowd of goblins, decked with serpents. Ratnasikhandin, the king of the Vidyādharas, who was coming to worship the sage, was enraged to see the evil action of Kandalavilāsa, and cursed him, saying that as a result of his offence he would become a hangman in the city of Ujjayinī. Implored by the Vidyādhara for mercy, Ratnaśikhandin decreed that he would regain his former state and powers, if he ever had an opportunity of meeting the great sage Sudatta, and received religious instruction from him. Incidentally, the king of the Vidyādharaś related that Sudatta was once the mighty king of Kalinga. One day a thief was produced before his court and accused of having murdered and robbed a barber in his sleep. The judges, consulted by the king, opined that the culprit should be subjected to various kinds of torture and maltreatment in such a way that he might expire in ten to twelve days. Hearing this verdict, Sudatta pondered over the dilemma of kings if they served the cruel ends of justice, they were bound to incur sin, if they did not, there would be social disorder and imputation of cowardice. Failing to solve the problem of reconciling justice with mercy, Sudatta renounced his kingdom and became a Jaina monk.

In due course the Vidyādhara appeared in the role of a hangman in Ujjayinī, and Yaśodhara and Candāmatī were reborn as a cock and a hen in a Cāndāla settlement in the vicinity of the city. One day the hangman who was known as Candakarman, happened to see the birds in the hands of a Cāndāla boy, acquired them from him, and took them to Yaśomatī. The latter was about to start for the garden of the Temple of the Thousand Spires, accompanied by a large retinue composed of boon companions and women of the harem, for the purpose of celebrating the worship of Makaradhvaja, the god of love. The king asked Candakarman to take the birds to the scene of the festival and give an exhibition of cock-fighting.

The temple garden was full of orange-coloured tents and rows of pavilions erected for the festival. Candakarman went there with the birds in a cage, accompanied by the augur Āsuri, a Bhāgavata, the astrologer Dhūmadhvaja, a Brāhmana, the Śaiva Haraprabodha, an expert in divining underground treasure, and the Buddhist Sugatakiṭi, a consummate cheat. There they saw Sudatta under an Asoka tree, and severally expounded before the sage the philosophical tenets followed by each. Sudatta refuted all their doctrines, and explained that Ahimsā or non-injury to living creatures is the basis of Dharma, the sole means of attaining worldly happiness and final beatitude. In illustration of his point, he referred to the sufferings of the two birds in their various previous births as a result of obeying the law of violence, and briefly mentioned the circumstances of the death of Candāmatī and Yaśodhara and the succession of their births. Candakarman and his companions, chastened by the teachings of the sage, took the vow of Jaina laymen, and Candakarman himself, having fulfilled the conditions of the curse inflicted upon him, regained his former status and departed for the world of the Vidyādhara

Meanwhile, Yaśomati was enjoying the company of his consort Kusumāvalī in a tent in the garden. Wishing to show her his skill in hitting invisible objects with arrows simply by hearing the sound, he shot an arrow which pierced and killed the cock and the hen left behind by Candakarman. Soon after, Kusumāvalī conceived, and the birds found their next birth in her womb. During the ante-natal period, the queen implored the king to proclaim protection from injury for all creatures and prohibit the sale of wine and the use of meat. Further, she expressed a keen desire to have teachings on kindness to living creatures expounded to her, and worship holy women noted for their self-control. The king was convinced that he was going to have a child with an innate leaning towards the Jaina religion, and tried his best to fulfil the wishes of the queen. In due course Kusumāvalī gave birth to a pair of twins, a boy and a girl, who were respectively called YASASTILAKA and Madanamati, better known as Abhayaruci and Abhayamati, on account of the mother's solicitude for abhaya or 'protection from injury' for all creatures during the period preceding their birth. The children grew up, and it was rumoured that Abhayaruci would soon be made crown-prince, and Abhayamati married to the king of Ahicchatra.

One day Yaśomati went hunting, and happened to see the sage Sudatta in the garden of the Temple of the Thousand Spires. Ajamāra, a boon companion of the king, suggested that the inauspicious sight of the naked ascetic augured ill for the hunt, and this annoyed the king and made him feel disgust for the sage. A merchant named Kalyānamitra, who had come to pay homage to Sudatta, entreated Yaśomati not to be disrespectful towards the saint, who was once the king of Kalinga and renounced his throne to practise religious austerities. The merchant and Yaśomati then both paid their respects to the sage, who greeted the king with a benedictory verse, and uttered a panegyric (p 262)

स्व वीरवैरवलितानयनेन्दुकान्तलिप्यन्दसंपदि मतोऽसि नरेश राजा ।

आदित्य एव च भवाच्चहिताङ्गनाङ्गनिस्तोकशोक्तपनोपलदीपनेषु ॥

The affable conduct of the sage touched the king to the heart, and repenting that he should have ever harboured ill-feeling for so good a man, he resolved within himself to cut off his own head and lay it at the feet of the sage as an expiatory offering. The latter at once read Yaśomati's thoughts and forbade him to do such a thing. The miraculous power of the sage astonished the king, who now questioned him about the whereabouts of his departed parents and grand-parents after their death. The sage related that Yaśorgha, the king's grand-father, after practising religious austerities according to Jaina tenets, became after his death a divine sage, while his mother Amrtamati went to the fifth hell in consequence of her sins. As for his father Yaśodhara and grand-mother Candramati, they had to undergo countless sufferings in many a birth owing to the sin of having sacrificed a cock made out of flour-paste in lieu of living animals, and have now been reborn as Yaśomati's own children, Abhayaruci and Abhayamati. The words of the sage made the king realise the enormity of his own sin on account of having killed numerous animals and partaken of their flesh since his early childhood. Disgusted with life, he made up his mind to follow the path of religion, but before renouncing the world, narrated to Abhayaruci and Abhayamati the story of their previous births.

The ascetic boy (Abhayaruci) now relates to Māradatta that he and his sister Abhayamati, on hearing their father's words, suddenly remembered their former births, and decided in their turn to renounce the world, although they were at that time only about eight years old. Owing to their tender age, they became religious apprentices under the sage Sudatta, and travelling in his company, had arrived at the outskirts of Ujjayini, when they were arrested by Māradatta's men and produced before him.

The narrative of the ascetic boy visibly moved Māradatta, and the latter, having realised that worldly happiness is like a dream or a magic show, expressed his desire to enter the order as a novice. Abhayaruci advised him to see the sage Sudatta, and both set out to meet the great teacher.

Book VI

Sudatta, perceiving by his supernatural knowledge that Māradatta was coming to meet him, himself came to the king's court, and was received with honour. Abhayaruci introduced Māradatta to the sage as the son of king Candamahāsena of the Yadu dynasty and the younger brother of his mother Kusumāvali, and spoke about the prince's desire to be initiated into the religious life. Māradatta then questioned Sudatta about the nature of Dharma, the causes of salvation and the cycle of births, and the duties of householders and monks.

Sudatta now commences his great discourse on Jaina doctrines, starting with a brief rèsumè and criticism of the theories of other schools, and an exposition of the doctrine of Samyaktva or right faith, that is, faith in the tenets of the Jaina religion. He then describes the four obstacles to the growth of Samyaktva as well as the four factors conducive to its growth, illustrating each of them with appropriate stories which occupy most of the Chapter. This portion of the discourse ends with an enumeration of the different categories of Samyaktva and a brief definition of Right knowledge and Right conduct, which with Samyaktva constitute the fundamental dogma of the Jaina faith

Book VII

Continuing his discourse, Sudatta deals with certain essential features of Jaina religious practice, e g, the prohibition of wine and meat. The stories are again prominent, and illustrate the evil results of drinking and flesh-eating and the merit of abstaining therefrom. Another series of stories illustrates in detail the bitter consequences of malevolence, theft or breach of trust, falsehood, lust and greed, abstention from which forms the keynote of the five primary vows known as Anuvratas.

Book VIII

The Jaina system of worship and devotions (japa, dhyāna etc.) is outlined in the remaining portion of Sudatta's elaborate discourse. His teachings have the desired effect, and Māradata and the citizens are initiated into the Jaina religion. Abhayaruci and his sister, Māradata who became an ascetic, the sage Sudatta, and Yaśomati, who had already renounced the world and taken the ascetic's vow, all became celestial beings after their death.

Somadeva sings the glory of the Jaina faith and acclaims the Goddess of Poetry at the end of the story (p. 418).

CHAPTER III

THE STORY OF YAŚODHARA AND ITS SOURCES

It is not possible to determine how old the story of Yaśodhara is, but it is certain that it is much older than the 10th century. It is said that a Yasodharacarita by Prabhañjana is mentioned in the unpublished Prākṛit romance Kuvalayamālā composed by Uddyotanasūri in 777 A. D. at Jāvāhpura, identified with Jhalor in Marwar¹. This shows that the story must have been current long before the eighth century, and we find it incorporated also in Haribhadra's Piākṛit romance Samarāṅcakahā Haribhadra was one of the gurus of Uddyotana, and his literary activity is assigned to the middle of the eighth century.

HARIBHADRA'S PRĀKRIT VERSION

The story of Yaśodhara occurs in the fourth Bhava of *Samarāṅcakahā*¹ in connection with the story Dhana and Dhanaśrī Haribhadra's version is a detailed narrative, and important as recording the story as it was current two hundred years before it was handled by Somadeva. Its most notable feature is the absence of the episode of Māradatta and the projected human sacrifice in the temple of Candamārī. It may be surmised, although we cannot be sure on the point, that this was a later addition to the story of Yaśodhara. Apart from this and certain other minor divergences, the Prākṛit version does not materially differ from the story as we have it in Somadeva's Yasastilaka. Another noteworthy feature is that the names of the principal characters differ in the earlier version, and the name Yaśodhara occurs only at the end. As in Somadeva's romance, the narrative is in the form of an autobiographical record, and related by the monk Yaśodhara to Dhana, the hero of the fourth Bhava of Samarāṅcakahā. The story as told by Haribhadra may be summarized as follows

Surendradatta was the son of Amaradatta, the king of Viśālā. Yaśodharā was his mother and Nayanāvali his wife. Surendradatta succeeded his father on the throne, and on a certain occasion made up his mind to renounce the world on discovering a white hair on his head, saying that the messenger of Dharma had arrived. On the eve of his departure from worldly life, he passed a night with his consort Nayanāvali in her mansion, and was surprised to see her slink away from his side at the dead of night. Fearing that she might have gone out to commit suicide in her grief at the impending separation from him, he followed her footsteps, sword in hand, and was amazed to see her in the embrace of a hunchback, who was employed as a watchman at the palace. The king, who observed them unseen, drew his sword and was about to kill the guilty pair, but restrained himself, thinking of his past affection for the queen, the follies of women, and the young prince Gunadhara, his son. He then returned to bed and feigned to be asleep, and was shortly afterwards joined by the queen, who quietly laid herself to rest by his side.

Next night the king saw in a dream that he was sitting on a throne on the top of the palace, but was thrown to the ground by his mother Yaśodharā, speaking something that was contrary to his wishes. He went rolling to the seventh floor below, followed by his mother who also rolled down after him, but he managed somehow to rise and climb up the Mandara mountain. The dream was unpleasant in the beginning, but pleasant towards the end, and the king could not guess its significance, yet he remained indifferent, bent as he was on the conquest of the life beyond.

Next morning the king appeared in court, and his mother also joined him there, but he gave her a different version of the dream with a view to making her more readily consent to his idea of renouncing the world. He spoke of having dreamt that he had transferred the kingdom to prince Gunadhara and become a monk and fallen from the top of the palace. The mother, who was an adept in the science of dreams, at once suggested that, in order to counteract the evil effect of the vision, he should assume the garb of a monk for a few days, and sacrifice different kinds of animals at the altar of the tutelary goddess. The king was horrified at the idea of killing animals, as he held ahimsā to be the basis of Dharma. The mother, however, persisted in her demand, and the king, finding it impossible to reconcile his religious principles with obedience to his mother, drew his sword to kill himself and asked her to worship the tutelary goddess with his blood. This led to a commotion among those present at the court, and the mother got frightened and deterred her son from the attempt. At this moment a cock crowed, and the old lady suggested that he should sacrifice before the goddess not a live cock, but one made out of paste. The king agreed and 'killed' with his sword an artificial cock in the shrine of the goddess, while the mother prayed for his longevity and health. The paste model was then roasted as if it were a real cock, and despite the objection of the king to the eating of meat, he was induced by his mother to partake of the sacrificial offering, on the plea that it was not real meat that he had been asked to eat.

Next day the young prince Gunadhara was installed on the throne, and preparations were made for the king's departure as a religious mendicant. The queen Nayanāvalī now thought if she did not accompany the king and share in his ascetic life, it would cause a great scandal, on the other hand, if he died, it would be possible for her to abstain from suttee on the plea that she would have to act as regent during her son's minority. Accordingly she decided to murder her husband by poisoning.

The hour of dinner arrived, and Nayanāvalī took her meal with the king. She had, however, secretly mixed poison with a digestive pill, and gave it to her husband at the end of the meal after the withdrawal of the guards. The king, suspecting nothing, took the pill and retired to his chamber and at once showed symptoms of poisoning. A hue and cry was raised by the doorkeeper, and physicians were sent for, but Nayanāvalī, thinking that medical consultation would not be to her advantage, cried aloud and rushed upon the king, and weeping without tears, strangled him to death. Yaśodharā also died the same day as her son.

The births and rebirths which the king and his mother undergo after their death are practically same in both the versions of the story until we come to the birth of Abhayaruci and Abhayamatī, these names being common to the two versions. In Haribhadra's version Abhayaruci and Adhayamatī are not brought to the temple of Candamārī for sacrifice, but are reborn as gods in the Sahasrāra heaven. On the termination of their life in heaven, Abhayaruci is born as the son of Vinayandhara, the king of Ayodhyā, and named Yaśodhara, while Abhayamatī is born as the daughter of Īśānasena, the king of Pātaliputra, and named Vinayamatī. When they were grown up, Vinayamatī was sent to Ayodhyā with a great retinue as sayamvarā bride for Yaśodhara, and preparations were at once made by the latter's father for the wedding of the young couple. But, on the day fixed for the marriage, while Yaśodhara was going in a procession on the back of a white elephant to the bride's quarters, he happened to see a monk begging at a merchant's house, which at once revived the memories of his previous births, and he fell into a swoon. The trouble was thought to be due to the toxic effect of betel, and sandal-water was sprinkled over the prince, who soon regained consciousness, opened his eyes, and felt a deep disgust for the world. Yaśodhara then asked his father to call the queens and the notables, and when they were all assembled in a road-side pavilion, he related the long story of his previous existences beginning with his birth as Surendradatta, king of Ujjain. He spoke about the terrible consequences of sin and his own indifference to the prison of the world, and finally declared his unwillingness to proceed with the marriage. The remonstrances of his father were of no avail, and a priest was at last sent to the bride to intimate to her the decision of the prince and his desire to renounce the world. The priest went on his mission and began to relate the story of Yaśodhara's previous birth, but as soon as the princess heard the names Surendradatta, Yaśodharā and Nayanāvalī, she in her turn remembered her past lives and fell into a swoon. Regaining consciousness, Vinayamatī bewailed the strange way of the world, and declared that she was no other than Yaśodharā, the mother of Surendradatta. She, too, expressed her desire to renounce the world and asked for permission to do so.

Yaśodhara's father was deeply moved by these happenings, and became convinced of the illusory nature of life, and the queens, too, realised the transient character of the world resembling a troop of actors. Yaśodhara's younger brother Yaśovardhana was then installed on the throne, while Yasodhara, his father, Vinayamati, the queens, and the chief notables renounced the world and took the monastic vow under a celebrated teacher named Indrabhūti. Thus ends the story of the monk Yaśodhara, as related by him to the merchant Dhana.

It will be seen that the sequel of Haribhadra's version differs completely from that of the story as found in Somadeva's Yasastilaka. A comparison of the two versions reveals certain other points of difference in the treatment of the story

Firstly, Somadeva does not pay much attention to Amrtamati after the murder of Yaśodhara beyond the fact that she appears occasionally in certain episodes, according to the requirements of the story, and we are told at the end that she went to hell. Haribhadra, on the other hand, gives a more detailed picture of the guilty woman after her crime. The prose description of Nayanāvali's affliction with leprosy is followed by several verses, in which her former beauty is contrasted with the physical havoc wrought by her dreadful disease. This reminds us of certain verses in Somadeva's description of the cremation ground in which he contrasts the decaying corpse of a courtesan with her former beauty and charms.¹ Haribhadra says, for instance (p. 262)

वयणेण थणहरेणं चरणेहि य जीए निजिया आसि । सव्वविलयाणमहियं सोहा ससिकलसकमलाणं ॥

तीए छिय पेच्छ कह अंगुलिबिगमखयसगमेहिं च । ते चेव हंदि देसा धणियं उच्चेवया जाया ॥

Haribhadra touches also the subject of Nayanāvali's redemption. Abhayaruci begs the sage Sudatta to give her religious instruction and initiate her into the Jain religion. The sage replies that she is beyond the scope of religious instruction, that her disease of Karma has been aggravated by her misdeeds acting like prohibited food, and that she is doomed to hell and unfit to receive the blessings of Jainism on account of her great delusion.²

Secondly, the motive of the murder is not the same in the two versions. Somadeva represents Amrtamati as acting in self-defence³, while in Haribhadra's version Nayanāvali murders her husband just to avoid taking the monastic vow. This is a weak point in Haribhadra's treatment of the story. The delineation of Amrtamati by Somadeva is far more complex, involving as it does a study of character and analysis of motives.

3 See below.

Thirdly, there is hardly any theological bias in Haribhadra's version. Somadeva employs the dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother in Book IV on the subject of animal sacrifice as a vehicle for launching a series of attacks on Hinduism, and the aim of the writer is also to establish the claim of Jainism to greater consideration than it seems to have received among his non-Jaina contemporaries.¹ In Haribhadra's version, the mother, indeed, asks her son to sacrifice animals 'according to the Vedic procedure', but the latter confines himself to pointing out that a propitiatory rite is not compatible with the killing of animals, and that he best performs a sāntikarma who regards all living beings with the same consideration as himself (p 246).

इहलोए परलोए य संतियम्म अणुत्तरं तस्स । जह पेच्छइ अप्पाणं तह जो सब्बे सया जीवे ॥

As regards the mother's contention that it is permissible to commit sin for the sake of health, the son asserts that it is rather on account of the protection given to living creatures that a man acquires longevity, beauty and health, besides winning universal admiration in the life to come (p. 247).

दीहाउओ सुरूवो नीरोगो होइ अभयदाणेणं । जम्मंतरे वि जीवो सयलज्जनसलाहणिज्जो य ॥

The controversy between the king and his mother, in Haribhadra's version, comes to an end with a declaration by the former of the evils of flesh-eating and the benefits of abstention therefrom. Throughout the episode the Jainia standpoint is stressed, but attacks on the Brahmanical religion are entirely absent. It is obviously far from the intention of Haribhadra to make the mother and the son protagonists of two rival faiths, as is done by the author of Yasastilaka.

Thoughts on the treachery of women are common to both the versions, and that of Haribhadra contains besides a condemnation of marriage in the episode of Yaśodhara and Vinayamati. Most of the birth stories generally agree in the two versions, but there are certain episodes which Haribhadra with his lucid and simple style treats in a more realistic fashion. The torture of the buffalo that killed the king's favourite horse, is, for example, repulsive enough in Somadeva,² but it is more so in the detailed picture of refined cruelty which Haribhadra presents before his readers. On the whole, the latter's version of the story of Yaśodhara is a well-balanced narrative with qualities which we miss in the intricate prose of Somadeva's Yasastilaka.

2 Book V.

ANALOGOUS STORIES

Considered as a folk-tale, the story of Yaśodhara is of considerable interest, although the motif of adultery is quite common in folklore and legend. The chief interest centres round the character of Amrtamati, who represents a type recognised very early in Indian literature. An ancient Buddhist text, for example, speaking of the seven kinds of wives, refers to the first variety as vadhakā 'murderess' and describes her thus

पटुचित्ता अहितानुकंपिनी अञ्जेसु रत्ता अतिमञ्जते पति ।

धनेन कीतस्स वधाय उस्सुका या एवरूपा पुरिसस्स भारिया ॥

वधका च भारिया ति च सा पटुचित्ति—Anguttaranikāya (Sattakanipāṭa LIX)

The vadhakā wife, we are told, is corrupt in mind and addicted to evil, she despises her husband and reserves her affection for others, she is bent on murder, and may be purchased by wealth. Guilty of adultery and murder, Amrtamati is vadhakā, but the characteristic thing about her is that she, a woman of high rank, has a lowborn paramour.

The closest parallel to the tale of Yaśodhara and Amrtamati is found in another Jaina story, that of Devarati and Raktā. Devarati was the king of Ayodhyā and Raktā his queen. It is said that Raktā had a paramour in the person of a lame gardener, and got rid of the king by murdering him and throwing the corpse into a river. The story of Devarati and Raktā seems to be as old as the Yaśodhara story, as it is referred to in Jasaharacarvu (II. 10) of Puspadanta¹, who, like Somadēva, belongs to the tenth century. The story is mentioned also in Anagārādharmāmṛta (4 77) of Āśādhara - who wrote about the middle of the thirteenth century.²

Jaina narrative literature acquaints us with the existence of Amrtamatis in middle-class society as well. In the story of the wealthy young merchant Dhana and his wife Dhanaśrī, occurring in the fourth Book of Haribhadra's Samaññaccakāhā, Dhanaśrī has a paramour in the person of her servant Nandaka, administers poison to her husband, throws him overboard during a sea-voyage, and succeeds in killing him even after he has escaped and become a monk. In the similar story in the sixth Book of the same work, Laksmī, the wife of the young and wealthy merchant Dharana, is no better than Dhanaśrī she first prefers a robber and then a merchant from China to her husband whom she attempts to murder. Two other women Gopavatī and Viravatī give evidence of similar propensities in stories which seem to be drawn from the life of the common people. Both the stories are mentioned in Jasaharacaru of Puspadanta (II 9) and in Anagāradharmāmṛta of Āsādhara (op cit.), who alludes to Raktā, Gopavatī and Viravatī together, showing that the three women were notorious in Jaina tradition for their treachery and crimes¹. It may be mentioned that Dasakumāracarita (Book VI) and Kathā-saritsāgara 10. 9 also contain a popular tale in which a woman attempts to murder her husband for the sake of a mutilated wretch, the two versions showing variations in details.

उज्झाहिउ देवरति ति मूढ पणुलणिसित्तु रत्ताइ छुट्ठ ।

The placid complacency of Yaśodhara after the discovery of his consort's crime is a noteworthy feature of our story and seems to go beyond the ordinary limits of forbearance. But the pardoning of the guilty wife is a trait that fits in with the religious character of the story, and the motif occurs also in the ancient Buddhist tale in which the Bodhisattva, while a king, once pardoned his chief queen, who had been found guilty of a serious offence and taken to the place of execution². Kings are not, however, always lenient in regard to their guilty wives, and Jaina tradition records stories of how some of them dealt with their adulterous queens. The Vivāgasūya, the eleventh Anga of the Jaina canon, records the story of the young priest Bahassaidatta, who is surprised by king Udāyana of Kosambī in the inner apartments of his palace in the queen's company, and in consequence arrested and sentenced to death. Another story occurs in Hemacandra's Parisistaparvan (2 547 ff), in which one of the wives of a king pays a nocturnal visit to an elephant-driver, as in the story of Yaśodhara, but is discovered, and a dreadful sentence is passed on the guilty pair.

POPULARITY OF THE STORY OF YAŚODHARA

The popularity of the story of Yaśodhara with Jaina writers seems to date from the tenth century. Puspadanta who told the story in Apabhramśa verse in his Jasaharacaru in four Cantos was a contemporary of Somadeva, the author of Yasastilaka. The story was next narrated in 1 रक्ता देवरति सरित्यवनिप रक्ताऽक्षिपत् पङ्क्तुके, कान्तं गोपवती द्रवन्नमवधीच्छित्त्वा मपलीशिर । शूलसेन मल्लिन्दुवेन दलित स्वोष्ठ किलाख्यत् पतिच्छिन्न वीरवतीति निनत्यमवलावृत्त सुवृत्ते सदा ॥ IV 77 See also Bhagavati Ārādhana, 949-51, and Brhatkathākosā, story Nos 85-87.

Sanskrit verse by Vādirāja who wrote a Yasodharacarita in four Cantos. Vādirāja is said to have been a pupil of Somadeva¹ and wrote his Pārsvanāthacarita, a Sanskrit Kāvya, in twelve Cantos, according to his own statement, in Śaka 947 or 1025 A. D. After Vādirāja may be mentioned Vāsavasena, who wrote a Yasodharacarita in Sanskrit in eight Cantos, and Vatsarāja who also composed a poem on the subject. Vāsavasena and Vatsarāja are earlier than the fourteenth century, as the poet Gandhaiva who made certain additions to the Jasaharacarita of Puspadanta in 1308 A. D. refers to both of them as his sources for certain episodes in the story of Yaśodhara.² Vāsavasena, too, mentions in his work two earlier poets who handled the story of Yaśodhara, viz, Prabhañjana and Harisena³. Prabhañjana, as we have seen, is earlier than the eighth century, and one of the earliest writers who narrated the tale of Yaśodhara. We know nothing about Harisena's work, but he may perhaps be identified with Harisena who wrote his Kathākosā in Sanskrit verse in 931 A. D. at Wadhwan in Kathiawar.⁴ There is however more than one Harisena, and the identification must await further evidence.

The widespread popularity of the tragic story of Yaśodhara is shown by the fact that numerous other poems dealing with the subject were composed in the succeeding centuries not only in Sanskrit but in Old Gujarati, Old Hindi, Tamil and Kannada, while a prose version of the story in Sanskrit was produced by Ksamākalyāna as late as the 18th century. A comprehensive list of these works has been compiled by Dr. Vaidya in the Introduction to his edition of Puspadanta's Jasaharacarita.

THE CHARACTER OF AMRTAMATI

Somadeva's Yasastilaka, composed in prose and verse, is entirely different from the other versions of the story of Yaśodhara inasmuch as it is also a great socio-political study and a learned compendium of philosophy, theology and religion. Even in the treatment of the story proper, Somadeva is not without some originality, following as he does his own method in dealing with some of the principal episodes. But his most important contribution to the narrative is his portrayal of Amrtamati's character. He, of course, regards her as a sinner, but takes care to analyse her motives, explain her conduct, and exhibit her point of view. Thus Yasodhara, in the course of his long and bitter tirade against women, tries to discover the cause of the queen's strange infatuation with the deformed elephant-driver, and attributes it to his melodious singing. He says "The preceptors declare singing to be the greatest of the arts. A well-sung song makes even a man, wretched by nature, the resort of the eyes of young women as of their minds. A singer, though ugly in appearance, is more beautiful in the eyes of women than even the god of love. Even women, not easily visible, are deeply attracted by song, as if dragged by a halter. Singing done by expert singers does away with the obstinate pride of proud women, and produces in them an anguish that cannot be remedied by others"¹ This at least partially explains the queen's undignified passion for a paramour of humble station.

Further, it is apparent from the words put in the mouth of Amrtamati, after the discovery of her infidelity, that her married life was an unhappy one, and she had come to Yaśodhara as an unwilling bride. This seems to be the meaning of her assertion that Yaśodhara and others like him can only be the masters of the bodies of their wives, sold to them by their parents in the presence of the gods, the Brāhmanas, and the Fire, but not of their hearts: the lord of one's heart is he who is the object of one's undivided love, 'the haven of confidence'² Less cogent is her appeal to the example of certain wives of legend, who, it is hinted, acted like her, the reference being to the relations of Gangā with Śiva, of Rādhā with Kṛṣṇa, of Tārā, wife of Brhaspati, with the Moon-god, and of Tārā, wife of Sugrīva, with Vāli. The appeal to antiquity reminds one of that in the nurse's speech in the Hippolytus of Euripides (vv. 451 sq.), and does not improve Amrtamati's case, it is rather an admission of her moral weakness. It is, however, certain that Amrtamati was thoroughly disgusted with her married life with Yaśodhara. As she says,³ there is nothing in the world which men of fortitude cannot do except the reawakening of love in a heart filled with disgust who can, indeed, unite two hearts that are like two iron balls, the one hot and the other cold² Further, she accuses Yaśodhara of jealousy when she says that only an intelligent person, free from jealousy, can be happy with women, one who behaves otherwise runs the risk of losing his life, like a worshipper of the evil spirit Kṛtyā, or at least incurs a woman's hatred¹ Amṛtamati's plea for reciprocity of love as an essential condition of conjugal harmony cannot, of course, absolve her from moral responsibility as wife and mother. But she says enough to convince us of the misery of her married life, and we may feel inclined to look upon her failure as a wife as a domestic tragedy rather than as an inveterate case of moral depravity.

The next episode, the murder of Yaśodhara, can be regarded only as a premeditated crime without any redeeming feature, but even here, as already pointed out, Somadeva represents Amṛtamati as acting in self-defence. She regards the story of Yaśodhara's dream and his plan to renounce the world as a feint³, that is, as a device to take her unawares, and resolves to act quickly 'Before he lets loose the poison of his wrath on me, I will let it loose on him!'⁴ She opines that a person who is honest in his dealings with cheats and villains, the wily and the selfish, and those who lack in self-respect, is a fool and becomes the dupe of all.⁴ So she decides to follow 'the policy of deceit for deceit' (sathapratī-sathanyāya), and pay Yaśodhara in his own coin. The plea of self-defence is, however, hardly convincing, as there is nothing in Yaśodhara's attitude to justify any suspicion of revengeful action on his part. Somadeva is well aware of this, and does not, in fact, try to palliate Amṛtamati's crime. But he depicts her as a weakling who cannot help her instincts, and lacks the moral strength to resist their power over her life. He analyses her motives and examines her conduct from different points of view, and seeks to preserve to some extent our sympathy for the guilty woman. In the succeeding portion of the story Somadeva does not add anything important to the traditional presentation of Amṛtamati's career, and seems rather to lose interest in her and lets her appear according to the exigencies of the story. But, on the whole, Amṛtamati in Somadeva's romance is a remarkable piece of characterization showing originality and skill, and reveals an aspect of the author's genius all but obscured by the wealth of scholarship and learning exhibited in the work.

CHAPTER IV

YAŚASTILAKA AS A PROSE ROMANCE

The history of Sanskrit prose romances shows a lamentable gap after the masterpieces of Bāna and Subandhu, and when prose romances reappear two centuries later, they bear the impress of new influences and point to a somewhat different literary environment. In the first place, most of the Sanskrit prose romances of the tenth and eleventh centuries were composed by Jaina writers, who were eager to expound and glorify their religion, and may be said to have introduced a religious element into this branch of literary composition. In the second place, there is an increased tendency to mix prose with verse, and the two earliest extant Campūs were, in fact, composed in the tenth century.

Somadeva's Yaśastilaka owes a good deal to Bāna and Subandhu in the matter of style and the treatment of conventional topics, but it differs from all other Sanskrit prose romances in so many respects that it may be said to stand in a class by itself. Apart from its special characteristics as a prose narrative, Yaśastilaka combines features which bring it into relation with diverse branches of Sanskrit literature. It is not only a Jaina romance in prose and verse but a learned compendium of Jaina and non-Jaina philosophical and religious doctrines, a manual of statecraft, and a great repository of Kāvya poetry, ancient tales, citations and references, and numerous rare words of lexical interest. Somadeva's Yaśastilaka is a work of massive scholarship enlivened by occasional flashes of literary genius and poetic feeling.

Among his predecessors in the field of prose romances, Somadeva mentions Bāna in Yaśastilaka, Book IV, and shows some acquaintance with his works, especially the Kādambarī. He clearly refers to the deprecation of the life of the Śabara hunters uttered by the parrot in Bāna's romance, and quotes a phrase from the passage in question¹. Somadeva's claim that the religion of the Arhat enjoys great renown in the works of Bāna among others should, however, be taken with a grain of salt. Bāna, indeed, refers to Jaina mendicants carrying peacock feathers in Kādambarī as well as *Harsacarita*², and in the former work describes Vilāsavatī as respectfully offering food to naked Jaina mendicants called Siddhas and asking them questions about the future.³ The Jinadharma, compassionate to living

1 'आहारः साधुजननिन्दितो मधुमासादिरिति कथं चेद मृगयोपयोगानन्द शबरवृन्द निन्दतावादि नाणेन ।'

2 'कैश्चित् क्षपणकैरिव मयूरपिच्छधारिभिः' Kādambarī, 'शिक्षितक्षपणकवृत्तय इव वनमयूरपिच्छध्वजानुचिन्वन्तः' Harsacarita, Book II

3 'स्वयमुपहृतपिण्डपात्रान् भक्तिप्रवणेन मनसा सिद्धादेशान् नमस्कृत्तुं पप्रच्छ ।' creatures, is mentioned in Kādambarī.¹ But the sight of a naked and unwashed Jaina mendicant with his peacock feathers is mentioned among certain evil omens enumerated in Harsacarita, Book V.²

Somadeva is not only influenced by Bāna and Subandhu in the conventional descriptions such as those of the seasons, morning and evening scenery, mountains, kings and countries etc., but also borrows an idea here and there from the earlier writers. The description of the different categories of villains and their origin in Yasastilaka, Book III, is obviously suggested by that of the fourteen families of nymphs and their origin in Kādambarī. The famous advice of Śukanāsa to Candrāpida has its counterpart in Yasastilaka, Book II. The conglomeration of picturesque names of women in brief sentences occurring towards the end of the same Book is a device already found in Kādambarī, Harsacarita and Vāsavadattā. The enumeration of evil omens in Yasastilaka, Book IV, may be compared with the similar lists in Harsacarita, Books V and VI. Dust in Kāvya literature is not as trifling a thing as one might suppose, and the description of the battle scene and the resulting dust in Yasastilaka, Book III, is forestalled in Vāsavadattā, while Bāna in Kādambarī pays attention to the dust raised by Candrāpida's expedition. A brief description of a cremation ground occurs in Subandhu's work, but the similar account in Yasastilaka, Book I, is in verse and far more elaborate and serves a different purpose.

These and other similarities between Yasastilaka and the romances of Bāna and Subandhu would appear to be superficial in face of the essential differences in style, outlook, and the character of the respective stories. The style of Bāna and Subandhu, though by no means simple, is simpler than that of Somadeva's prose, and the Jaina narrative shows, on the whole, a greater elaboration of details than is found in Kādambarī and Vāsavadattā. It is noteworthy that Somadeva has chosen to employ the involved style even in the moral and religious tales narrated in Yasastilaka, Books VI and VII, and one of the factors which makes his prose less attractive than that of Bāna and Subandhu is the use of rare and obsolete words, which, though valuable from a philological point of view, makes Yasastilaka a far more difficult work than the earlier prose romances. Many of the descriptive passages are undoubtedly more complicated and artificial than those of Kādambarī. One may contrast, for example, the portrait of Jābālī with that of Sudatta in Yasastilaka, Book I; the picture of the Śālmali tree in the Vindhya forest in Bāna's romance with the unwieldy description of the huge tree in the valley of the Suvela mountain towards the beginning of Yasastilaka, Book V, and Bāna's beautiful portrayal of the trees around the Śiva temple where Mahāśvetā worshipped with the Jaina author's laboured description of the pleasure garden in Yasastilaka, Book I. Similarly, the enumeration of different varieties of plants illustrated in Subandhu's description of the sea-shore in Vāsavadattā is overdone in Somadeva's picture of the great forest in Yasastilaka, Book V. It may be said, on the whole, that in natural descriptions Somadeva is far excelled by Bāna and Subandhu; and there is nothing in Yasastilaka which will bear comparison with the serene picture of the rule of concord and harmony governing the life of animals and human beings in Jābāli's hermitage, as described in Bāna's Kādambarī. Lengthy and detailed descriptions of female beauty, so wearisome to readers of Sanskrit prose romances, are practically absent in Yasastilaka owing to the very nature of the subject-matter.

More important than the question of style is the fundamental difference between the story of Yaśodhara and the romantic tales of Kādambarī and Vāsavadattā. The salient feature of the story of Yaśodhara is that it is a realistic tale based on a domestic tragedy, even an unpleasant incident of domestic life, around which is woven a story of moral and religious edification. It was a daring experiment on the part of Somadeva to have composed a romance, of which adultery and murder were two prominent features, in the grand style of Bāna and Subandhu, and Yasastilaka, is, as a matter of fact, the only considerable Sanskrit prose romance which deals with tragic incidents of conjugal life, eschewing romantic love in favour of grim realities and the workings of fate. From this standpoint Yasastilaka may be described as a realistic novel, and the note of realism is accentuated by the complete absence of the miraculous except in a few minor episodes independent of the main story. This appears to be a noteworthy characteristic of Somadeva's work when we remember the part played by the miraculous in all other Sanskrit prose romances from Kādambarī to Gadyacintāmanī.

Two other characteristic features of Yasastilaka may be emphasized: it is a vivid picture of certain aspects of contemporary life and society as well as a great religious romance, and in both respects it differs widely not only from Kādambarī and Vāsavadattā but from the remaining Sanskrit prose romances. These points have been dealt with in subsequent chapters, and we may here attempt a somewhat detailed treatment of Somadeva's prose as far as it is represented in his Yasastilaka.

As is usual in Sanskrit prose romances, long-winding descriptions preponderate in Yasastilaka to the detriment of the narrative, and are often complicated by conglomerations of intricate and loosely constructed compounds of considerable length. There is, however, no doubt that Somadeva has at his command a rich variety of details, and shows an intimate knowledge of diverse phases of the life of his times. The conventional descriptions are mostly involved and artificial, but there are others simpler and more effective, mostly dealing with topics peculiar to the romance, and by no means frequent in Kāvya literature. We may start, for example, with the picture of the dread goddess Candamārī in Book I (p. 150)

यस्या कपालमाला शिखण्डमण्डनानि, शवशिशवः श्रवणावतंसाः, प्रमितप्रकोष्ठा कर्णकुण्डलानि, परेतकीकरमणयः कण्ठभूषणानि, परासुनलरसा शरीरवर्णकानि, गतजीवितकरङ्गा करकीडाकमलानि, सीधुसिन्धवः सध्याचमनकुल्या पितृवनानि विहारभूमयः, चिताभसितानि चन्द्रकवलाः, चण्डातकमार्द्रचर्मणि, सारसनं मृतकान्त्रच्छेदा, प्रनर्तनप्रदेशसंस्थितोर स्थलानि, कन्दुकविनोदस्तम्भोत्तमाङ्गैः, जलकेलयः शोणितदीर्घिकाभिः, निशाबलिप्रदीपाश्मशानकृशानुकीलाभिः प्रत्यवसानोपकरणानि नरशिरः करोटिभिः, महान्तिदोहदानि च सर्वसत्त्वोपहारेण ।

“Garlands of human skulls are her head-ornament. Corpses of children are her ear-ornament. The elbows of dead men are her earrings. Balls made from the bones of dead bodies form her necklaces. The oozing from the leg-bones of corpses serve as her cosmetics. Skeletons play the part of toy-lotuses in her hands. Rivers of wine are the streams wherein she performs her evening ablutions. Charnel-fields are her pleasure grounds. The ashes of funeral pyres are her face-ornament. Raw hides constitute her robe. The intestines of dead bodies form her girdle. The bosoms of dead men are her dancing floor. She plays with the heads of goats as with balls. Her water-sports take place in lakes of blood. The blazing fires of cremation-grounds serve as her votive lamps at night. Human skulls are the vessels she eats from. Her greatest pleasure is when living creatures of all kinds are sacrificed at her altar.”

The description of the shrine of the goddess, the Mahābhairav temple, gives a good idea of a contemporary cult of savage character, and is perhaps the most elaborate picture of its kind in Sanskrit literature and, although in this respect Somadeva is anticipated by Bāna in his description of the temple of Candikā in Kādambarī, and by Haribhadr in his verse description of the temple of Kādambarī or Candikā in Samarcandakahā (Book VI), the corresponding account in Yasastilaka preserves interesting details not recorded elsewhere¹. The delineation of the surging crowd of the Mahāyoginīs in the temple, for example, although fantastic to some extent, graphically presents the grim aspect of these monstrous deities, “extremely ferocious and long-limbed like the Night of universal destruction”. “They were emerging with fury from the surface of the sky from the earth, from the depths of the nether regions, and from all the corners of the sky, like darkness at night" "The banners of the Sun's aerial car were singed by the flames issuing from the eye on their foreheads, being fanned by the gaspings of the hapless serpents, ruthlessly pressed in the tangled masses of their hair, while the Sun's rays were obstructed by the huge vultures hovering about the gruesome skulls decorating their heads, and the ornamental designs of blood painted on their cheeks were being lapped up by the snakes adorning their ears."¹

A notable picture is the dramatic appearance of the spy of Yasodhara in the streets of Ujjain with his grotesque dress and clamorous retinue (Chap III, p. 397).

"His head was adorned with a crown of peacock feathers surmounted by a crescent, and he was wearing earrings made of red lac and shaped like the flowers and buds of the silk-cotton tree. The neck was stiffened by the fastening of a necklace made out of many varieties of magic roots, and he was wearing a garland made from shreds of old rags, multicoloured, and reaching to the feet. The upper arms were decorated with armlets made of tin balls large as plums, and the forearms enveloped with buffalo-horn bracelets up to the elbows, while a garland of Guñja berries served the purpose of a varhaksaka wreath across the bosom. The hands were rugged like the bony frame of the carapace of a tortoise, and the privy parts were covered with the lower edge of an old saddle cloth. The waist was decorated with a girdle of worn out churning ropes, and the attention of the passers-by was attracted by the nimble gait of his feet resounding with the brass anklets worn by him. He announced his nocturnal rites with the sound of his buffalo-horn, and he was, in fact, dressed in an attire exactly like that of Lord Śiva disguised as the Kīrāta hunter. He was the son of the chief panegyrist Katakādhīpati (Camp-commander), the son-in-law of the minstrel Subhata-sauhārda (Friend of Warriors), the grandson of the jester Śīotīyakītava (Brahmana Gambler), and the refuge of all who had transgressed their vows. His food and emoluments were earned by arranging the nuptials of all the harlots¹, and he had endowments of hornless cows and she-buffaloes registered in his favour in all the daily farms. The glory of his wisdom and knowledge of mystic formulas and rites was proclaimed in the following manner by religious mendicants², carrying sticks and deerskins, and acting as informers, with bodies made ugly by excessive decorations. 'Here is the Exalted One who has communed with the Mahāyoginīs and acquired supersensuous knowledge. He has attained spiritual perfection, and his utterances are unfailingly true. By his art of enchantment he can unite even a lion with an elephant, and by means of animosity-producing drugs he can make even a mother an enemy of her children.'³

The picture of the elephant-driver in Book IV is a minute study in ugliness, which is emphasized in such a manner as to suggest the enormity of the queen's strange infatuation. He is described as sleeping on the floor of a thatched hut strewn with grass left over from the ration of elephants, resting his head on a heap of coiled up ropes serving as a pillow. His only clothing was a piece of rag used for rubbing elephants with oil. He had coarse thorn-like hair, ears like old shoes, eyes like the mouth of a bucket; lips like the fringe of a leather oil-flask gnawed off by rats, cheeks like the hollow of an age-worn tree, teeth protruding like an irregular row of cowries, a chin hardly visible, as he had a regular goat's beard,⁴ a throat with the veins visible, resembling the trunk of a castor-oil plant, arms like a couple of dead serpents suspended from on high, a stomach bloated like inflated billows; and thighs like stakes damaged by fire. 'He was repulsive to sight like a mass of sins, and extremely disgusting like a charnel-field. He appeared to be a compact mass of iron rust in human shape, and fashioned by the Creator by combining all kinds of deformities.' The original passage runs as follows (Chap. IV, p. 42)

The account of the regiments of Yaśodhara's army has more than a literary interest, and is full of important details throwing light on the composition of old Indian armies. It is one of the most remarkable descriptions not only in Yasastilaka but in Sanskrit literature as a whole (chap III, p 461 etc.)

"Sire, this is the Deccan regiment practised in the use of diverse arms. The luxuriant tangle of the hair of the men is tied up with cloth bands around their foreheads. Conspicuous by the horns carried by them, entwined with sprays of fullblown Palāśa flowers, they look like a troop of rhinoceroses; and with the tips of their knives coming up to the roots of their beards, they resemble a troop of elephants with the cheeks dotted with flowing ichor. They are wearing triple necklaces made of many-coloured beads, and look like Śiva's troops, awful on account of their necks being enwrapped with Mahāmandala serpents. They have the forearms enveloped with iron bracelets worn up to the elbows and resemble a thicket of sandal trees with the branches entwined by young snakes. With their daggers fixed about the centre of the waist, they resemble the mountain wherewith the gods churned the ocean, with its central slope encircled by the lord of serpents (Vāsuki). With their thick loin-cloths tucked up as far as the thigh-joints, they look like a crowd of religious mendicants wearing kaupīna. They are looking up on hearing the many laudatory poems, and stand with upturned faces, as they listen to the minstrels loudly reciting exuberant panegyrics in their honour. Their bodies are scratched all over with upward lines of finger-nail marks."

The report of the spy against a minister of Yaśodharma and the account of the embassy sent by the king of Pañcāla to the latter's court, in Book III, are not only socio-political records of great value but interesting as good specimens of Somadeva's simpler style and businesslike prose The account of the embassy has been reproduced elsewhere¹ and we may here give a few illustrative extracts from the former document. It is necessary to point out that the spy's report, comprehensive as it is, contains, besides specific charges against the minister in question, a satire in prose and verse against ministers in general, quasi-historical traditions, and observations on human traits.

Speaking of villains, the spy gives a fanciful account of their origin, classifying them into eighteen different groups. The first group originated from the Kālakūta poison in Śiva's throat, the second from serpents, the third from the ferocious beak of Garuda, the fourth from the moon of the fourth lunar day (believed to cause disputes), the fifth from the attendants of Death, the sixth from the dust of a libertine's feet¹, the seventh from fire, the eighth from hell, the ninth from the illusion created by Viṣṇu, the tenth from the jaws of the god of death, the eleventh from the evil way taught by heretic schools, the twelfth from the sin of doubt and hesitation, the thirteenth from burning shame, and the fourteenth from the arts of deception. In addition to these, one group of villains originated from darkness, whence arose in the sky Rāhu, the enemy of the other planets. A second group originated from the quarrel of Brahman and Viṣṇu at the time of the glorification of the Phallic Śiva², whence arose also the sage Nārada, the lover of disputes. A third group originated from the clash of thunder and lightning, whence arose also the submarine fiend. A fourth group of villains originated from Diti who gave birth to Tāṇaka, the demon who habitually cheated all pious people on the earth. This account of the origin of villains appears to be Somadeva's invention, and shows imagination and selective power, although in design he is indebted to the story of the fourteen families of nymphs and their origin in Bāna's Kādambarī. An indirect reference to this occurs in the passage in Yasastilaka which runs as follows (Chap III, p 441)

देव, अप्सरसामिवामरेषु नरेष्वपि किल खलानां चतुर्दश कुलानि पुरा प्रादुर्बभूवुः । तत्र तावत् प्रथमं प्रमथ-

The irresistible and invariable character of the evil propensities of a man is illustrated with various examples. Addressing the king, the spy says- देव, मासरसरतस्य पुंसः किमिव मासव्रतम् । रुपादे भुञ्जानस्य हि नरस्य क इव केशदर्शनादाशप्रत्यादेशः । पुरे प्रमोषदक्षस्य हि पुरुषस्य केव कान्तारेऽपेक्षा । निरम्बरनितम्बायामात्मांम्बाया दाहोद्योगस्य हि जनस्य क इव पराम्बायामम्बरपरित्यागः । यत्

Because, how can one who devours the living have pity on a corpse? How can one who sacrifices his own child be compassionate to that of another?" 3 174

A merchant¹ does not give up his art of deception even when he is on the verge of death. Because, verily, of whatever nature a person may be, it is hard for him to discard it. A monkey never forsakes his fickle habits even if he is given a hundred kinds of training" 3. 175.

The tirade against the ministers of kings in verse, forming part of the spy's report, has been summarized elsewhere; and there is also a satirical description of them in prose (Chap III, p. 439):

"Sire, the pomp of dress and flurry of remedial measures of those devils, the ministers of Your Majesty, straightforward as you are, are intended to give an impression of honesty and loyalty. Their real purpose is as follows. The flowing robes of ministers are like a hunter's cloak enveloping all his limbs, and designed to kill honest people, like deer. The huge mass of their beard and hair seems to be a drag-net for capturing ignorant fools, like fish. Their big bellies are like a pool for amassing tricks, like a flock of cranes. They walk slowly and slowly like jackals to look for the weak points of others. A minister makes very frequent ceremonial dips into waters, as if with a thievish purpose. 'How will indeed the crest-jewels of the serpent Ananta abiding in the nether regions come into my possession?' He worships the Sun, as if with motives of robbery. 'When will those horses of the Sun's chariot, coursing in the sky, play the ball-game of war for me' He strikes the Fire by way of offering oblations, as if out of spite, saying 'Since it is I who destroy my own refuge or benefactor, and destroy also all and sundry, why dost thou, o wretched Fire assume the names āśrayāsa (one who consumes one's own refuge) and sarvāsa (one who consumes all)?' The worship of the gods by a minister is comparable to letting loose a bird of prey for killing honest people, like birds, with the idea that not even Brahmā sees through a well-devised trick¹ The muttering of prayers by a minister seems to be a device for recalling how many great men he has cheated and how many still remain uncheated The meditation of a minister is like that of a crane for the purpose of 'devouring' able men, like fish The study of the Law Books by him is like that of a thug for the purpose of cheating the wise His obeisance at the guru's feet looks like the spreading of a network of chains for obstructing the way to heaven. His sweet words, like those of a witch, serve only to ruin his followers His amiable looks, like the pleasant aspect of the embankment of a dried up pool, bring distress to those who are ignorant of the inner truth "

The more important of the charges against Yaśodhara's minister bearing on contemporary conditions have been discussed in another chapter, viz, Chap V Some of the observations of the spy on the ways of the minister provide interesting reading The cultural pretensions of the man are severely criticized, his mean tricks exposed, and the secret of his fame explained. A healthy feature is the insistence on learning being independent of wealth procured by royal favour

"Sire, riches, although they do not crop up of their own accord, may, like brides seeking a husband, come into the possession even of a man fallen from the sky, as a result of (royal) favour, but learning, like the span of life, never comes to a man, even though accompanied by efforts, unless he attends the lecture-hall of a teacher. Because, 'wealth there may be in plenty in men's homes as a result of a king's favour, but not nobility of birth nor scholarship' (3 179) When, my lord, there is a show of learning in a man, although he is devoid of these two qualities, it is due not to his own ability but to that of wealth, just as a flash of lightning in the sky is due not to any potency of the sky itself but to the presence of clouds

The field of the intellect, although devoid of the water of learning, may on account of the power of wealth undulate with falsehood, and prove attractive to those deer, the dunces (3 180) Indeed, this minister (of yours) has the hardihood to hold forth on certain branches of art, although lacking in depth, just as a drop of oil spreads on water without penetrating below the surface; but even that is due not to any great measure of intelligence on his part, but to his association with people who commit the sin of prostituting their learning, being without any self-respect, with all sense of pride destroyed by the axe of chill penury,¹ and the antelope of their intelligence trapped in the snare of the hope of gaining an infinitesimal quota of wealth. Sure, the fragrance of the mouths of slave girls is due not to any luck but to their taking the remnants of the betel chewed by their masters. The lovely redolence of a breeze is due not to its natural qualities but to its contact with flower gardens. The fierce burning of wood is due not to its natural properties but to the action of fire. A dog is eager to fight not on account of his courage but on account of the presence of his master, and a piece of stone becomes an object of veneration not on account of its natural state but because it is shaped into the likeness of a god.

Further, the minister annoys the Exalted Goddess of Speech with his wretched verses, his purpose being to proclaim the villainy of his subordinates. This is meant to put outsiders off the scent, who would be led to think, 'How can a man who speaks thus (about the vices of his subordinates) be a villain himself?'

Then it is the associates of the many heretics, wandering in the world to its farthest limits, who have oftentimes given wide publicity to his way of life, similar to that of a spendthrift whore.

1 Lit, the axe of a stomach difficult to replenish.

His fame has been spread in the world by religious mendicants snake-charmers, Kāpālikas, jugglers and consummate thugs " 3 183

The minister is then accused of various offences such as tyranny, disloyalty, usurpation of power and financial maladministration, all kinds of motives being attributed to him

"Like an outbreak of fire, he oppresses the innocent population even in peaceful times, because a king whose realm is prosperous is sure to do some harm (to his ministers), like the god of death. He creates disaffection among the loyal citizens, because a king with a large following is like a mountain and comes under no one's influence. He squanders public funds, because a king with a depleted treasury can be tackled with ease, like a bird whose wings are cut off. He consolidates your enemies, because a prince overwhelmed by peril is like an invalid, and gives no offence to his counsellors. He never tolerates any highborn person, thinking that a king in the grip of any particular individual is, like an elephant, unlikely to come under the influence of others. Who would believe that such a man would be of any help in the preservation of life or the protection of property in times of danger? Because, how can a minister who strives to do continuous harm even in easy circumstances exert himself for the good of his master in times of peril?" 3 184.

The minister is also accused of having banished various distinguished men whose presence was vital to the welfare of the state (Book III, p. 453):

ततोऽसौ यदि देवस्य परमार्थतो न कुप्यति, सत्पुरुषपरिषदिव मनसि मनागपि नाभ्यसूयति, तत् किमिति मनीषा-

"If then he really has no illwill towards Your Majesty, and if he, like an assembly of good men, bears not the slightest malice in his heart, why has he monopolized all power by banishing, like a dove flying into a house,¹ such men as Pundarikākṣa, whose intellect and insight were as the crest-jewel of all cultured and spirited men by virtue of his talents and courage? The triumph of kings depends upon elephants, yet (why did he banish) Bandhujiva whose mental faculties were devoted to the mastery of all branches of elephant-love? The fame of kings lasts as long as the sun and the moon owing to their patronage of great poets, yet (why did he banish) the poet Hāra, an excellent votary of the nectar of sweet utterances on the creeper of your fame? Wealth that does not support the good is of no use knowing this, why did he, being intolerant, banish yet other learned men, friendly by nature to Your Majesty?"

Good examples of reflective prose are provided by the musings of Yaśodhara after the discovery of the misconduct of his consort. Pausing after his momentary resolve to kill her, Yaśodhara says (Chap IV, p 48)

आ किमिदमहो कर्माहमनुष्ठानु व्यवसित । न खलु नार्य इव शुभमशुभं वा कर्म सहसैवारभन्ते विनीतमतय , नापि विपदि सपदि वा कृपणप्रकृतय इवाशु विक्रिया गच्छन्ति महानुभावा , न चातप्येवसासिब महीयसासुपपन्ना भवन्ति कामचारेण प्रवृत्तय , न चैतद्गहन किनु प्रातर्मयैव लज्जावनतमस्तकेन शिर पिवाय स्थातव्यम् । शोचितव्यं च मयैव प्रणयिना पुर पश्चात्तापदु प्रतिष्ठानमिदमनुष्ठानम् । श्रोतव्या भविष्यन्ति मयैव कर्णकटुताकारा पुरजनस्य विकारा । सुष्ठु मलिनीकृत स्यान्मयैवात्मीय मार्याय च कुलम् । सोढव्या मयैव स्वदुष्कृतनिरुत्तरविवाधित्तशयस्पृश कुलवृद्धानामभिधा । अहमेवोदाहरण भविष्यामि दुर्बुद्धीना कुटुम्बविघटने । कलुषतामेध्यलेषैवास्थाने विनियोजिता खड्गलता । स्त्रीवादयमजनि तपस्वीति मृतस्यापि मे न दुर्यश प्रशान्तिमर्हति । शोकातङ्के पतिष्यति च सापरावसवित्रीमृतिदु खितो युवराज । पर च बहुपराधे हि देहिनि क्षणमात्रव्ययाशरण मरणमनुग्रह इव । यदि पुनरनवेक्षणसुस्थितस्य, असभाषणमासन्नस्य, उपेक्षण विज्ञपयत, अवधीरणमसमै परिभूयमानस्य, आशाभङ्गकरणमर्ययत, प्रीतिवितरण तदनभिमतानाम्, अस्मरण प्रियगोष्ठीषु, अनवेक्षण तत्परिजनस्य, अपवार्य व्याहरण स्वप्रकाशेष्वप्यालापेषु, अनवसरानुसरणमसगभावेष्वपि प्रस्तावेषु क्रियेत, स्यात् प्रत्यानीतश्चिरमस्थाने कृतसमय प्रणय ।

"Ah, what have I set myself to do? Certainly the wise never do anything good or bad, like women, on the spur of the moment, nor are the high-spirited quickly perturbed, like the weak-minded, in prosperity or danger, nor do arbitrary acts befit the great as they they do those who are poor in talents. This is by no means hard to comprehend (If I kill her) it is I who will have to cover my head on the morrow, downcast with shame, it is I who will have to bewail my action, injudicious on account of repentance, in the presence of friends, it is I who will have to hear the reproaches of the citizens, harsh to the ear, it is I who will have tarnished my own family and that of my uncle, it is I who will have to bear the cutting remarks of the elders, without any means of reply on account of my misdeed. I will be cited as an example of how the foolish disrupt their own families. And this sword will be polluted, if applied to an unworthy object 'He became a miserable wretch by murdering a woman'—this evil report concerning me will not subside even after my death. And the prince (Yaśomati), miserable at the death of his guilty mother, will be sorely afflicted with grief. Besides, death with its momentary pain is as a favour to one who has committed a grievous offence. On the other hand, it is possible to repudiate long misdirected love if the person so loved is treated with contempt¹ even on isolated occasions, for example, if one does not take any notice of him when present, if one does not talk to him when near, if one ignores him when he makes a statement, if one neglects him when insulted by his inferiors, if one disappoints him when he asks for a favour, if one befriends those who are disliked by him, if one does not mention him in conversation with friends, if one does not look at his attendants, and if even in self-evident matters (requiring no deliberation) one dismisses him on the pretext of lack of leisure."

After recognising that the pageant of life loses its meaning without women, Yaśodhara dilates on their villainy and faithless character (p. 61)

"Constantly pampered, they deride men as they would a tame monkey. They are never satisfied with presents, and when treated with marks of esteem, they mock at men as being sheep. When sought after, they look upon men as brutes. When enjoyed against their will, they forsake men like a water-pot used in a cremation ground. Jealously questioned, they bite like serpents. They shun those who are virtuous like the Neem tree (with the bitter leaves), and regard those who act from pure motives as clods of earth. Women become a source of perennial evil even while they profess love, pierce one's limbs even while they laugh, consume one's body even while they cast glances, undermine one's strength of mind even while they talk, and degrade a person even lower than a blade of grass by attaching themselves to him. When guarded, they commit misdeeds by resorting to their own devices, and there is in fact no means of effectively guarding them."

The disgruntled husband takes a pessimistic view of youth, wealth and the joys of life, all these being regarded as disturbing influences on the moral life. The observations are enlivened by a large number of illustrative similes (p. 66)

“The advent of youth, like the drinking of wine, never fails to pervert the minds even of those who are bent on salvation. The pride of wealth, like birth-blindness, causes an incurable paralysis of all the senses. Erotic lore, like a villain’s counsel, is a magic wand for raising serpents, the evils of life. The poets, like demons, bewilderingly divert the minds of men, although straightforward by nature, to mundane joys. The practice of the arts is like the sound of a drum, awakening the serpents of evil passions. The enjoyment of a beloved woman, charming only at the beginning, like an appointment newly obtained, forcibly intoxicates even very wise men, and taking possession of the heart, fills it with pride. The subservient attendants are like borrowed ornaments¹. Not to speak of the combination of these evils, even one of them is sufficient to destroy sentient beings.

The Goddess of wealth, for whom the world has so great a longing, becomes fickle like a particle of mercury even when she comes into one’s possession by chance. Like the friendship of villains, she is bound to cause some calamity even when she is one’s associate. Like gruel made from the Apāmārga plant, she cannot be assimilated even when one has acquired her. Like a lewd woman, she longs for a paramour even when cherished with care. Like wine, she deludes the mind even while she is enjoyed. Like an eclipse, she never fails to cause distress even after she has vanished. Although she appears at the call of bravery, she practises deception, like a demoness, in order to destroy the eminence of the great. For a moment she befriends the villains.”

The difficulty of controlling the mind is emphasized in Sudatta’s reflections in Book I, similes being used as usual to give point to the remarks (p. 111)

तथा सकृच्चलितं च चेतः प्रासाद इव पुनः दुष्करमुद्धर्तुम्, दूरतरमुन्नतानि गिरिशिखराणीव शक्यन्ते शरीरेणा हृदयानि सुखेनैवाधस्तात् पातयितुमारोहयितुं न पुनर्दुःखेनापि । अस्ति च ‘श्रेयासि बहुविघ्नानि’ इति विदुषा प्रवादः । श्रुताभ्यासश्च विसतन्तुर्दन्तिनमिव प्रत्यवस्यन्तमात्मानमलं न भवति निवारयितुम्, तनुच्छद इवाधीरधीषु न जायते चलतश्चित्तस्य त्राणाय देहदाहकरागम संयमः, बहिर्स्थावस्थित पारदरस इव द्वन्द्वपरिगतं पुमान् क्षणमपि नास्ते प्रसख्यानक्रियासु ।

“It is as difficult to steady the mind, once it has gone astray, as it is to restore a building shaken to its foundations. The hearts of men,

1 1 e fickle, faithless. Borrowed ornaments denote the idea of instability as they are claimed back by their owners. The idea is fully explained in a Buddhist simile which compares the pleasures of sense to borrowed wealth. See Majjhima Nikāya, Potaliya Sutta (LIV). याचितकूपसा कामा’ like extremely high mountain-peaks, can easily be flung to a lower level, but cannot be elevated even with difficulty. And there is a saying of the wise that the good is accompanied by many impediments. The study of the Scriptures cannot check the evil self, just as lotus fibres cannot hold back an elephant. Self-control, physically distressing as it is, cannot protect the unsteady minds of those who are fickle, just as an armour cannot fortify the wavering hearts of cowards. A man surrounded by distractions cannot concentrate even momentarily on meditative efforts, just as mercury placed over the fire does not last even for a moment."

A few homely pictures are provided by Somadeva's description of certain misers in Yasastilaka. In the humorous prelude to the spy's report, the latter speaks of a fellow named Kihñjaka described as 'the foremost of misers'. "He is to be counted first among the stingy. He is the exemplar of the penurious, and deserves to be called the chief of the untidy. He is the crest-jewel of the greedy, and his name can be mentioned only at the end of a meal." The spy gives a detailed account of the wretched meal to which he was treated by the miser (Book III, p. 404)

The description is of interest not only on account of the names of a large variety of fruits and vegetables but as providing detail of domestic life, and is a contrast to the rather empty rhetoric which sometimes characterizes Kāvya prose, including Somadeva's own writing. It reminds one of a similar but less complex account of poor men's fare preserved in an extract from the Greek comedian Alexis, cited by Athenaeus in Deipnosophistae II 55.

Somadeva in Yasastilaka, Book VII (section 32), gives another picture of a notorious miser, the wealthy merchant Sāgaradatta, who has rather queer notions of economy and resorts to ingenious devices to put them into practice. He does not, for instance, buy oil for lighting his courtyard, but hangs a mirror from the edge of the roof of his house, and allows the light from his neighbour's house to be reflected in the mirror. He would advise the boys of the household not to waste oil in massaging their bodies before bath, but to have contact with the oil-smeared bodies of the boys of the neighbourhood in a close fight with them. He would instruct his servants to purchase oil and salt and then return both as being bad, the particles adhering to the receptacle being sufficient for subsistence! He avoids washing expenses by selling his dirty linen, and never accepts an invitation to dinner lest he should be required to return the invitation, and his servants see what other people ate in their homes. It will be conceded that we have here a portrait worthy of Theophrastus.

Descriptions of female beauty so frequent in Sanskrit literature are rare in Yasastilaka. A well-drawn picture is that of the beautiful daughters-in-law of Queen Celini, followed by the pathetic figure of the wife of Puspadanta, grown ugly and emaciated after twelve years of separation from her husband who had taken the monastic vow¹. The portrait of Māradatta in Book I is chiefly remarkable for the young king's love of dangerous exploits and strange rites, while the cumbrous description of king Yaśorgha in Book II may be contrasted with the simple one of Sudatta as king of Kalinga in Book V. The seasonal descriptions in Book I form the background of Sudatta's religious austerities which are briefly outlined. Not much interest attaches to the artificial description of Avanti in Book II and the pleasure garden in Book I.

Most of the natural descriptions are of the conventional type and often characterized by artificial conceits and commonplace images. There are, however, others enlivened by striking details illustrating the author's powers of observation. Mention may be made of the animated description, in Book V, of the prosperous dairy-farm of Karahāta, full of all kinds of cows, horses, mules, donkeys and sheep, 'a combination, as it were, of the oceans of curds, milk and clarified butter'. A variety of scenes common to life in a dairy-farm in medieval India is vividly described (p 184)

"Somewhere in the farm the kids are harassed by the unchained young dogs, and elsewhere an old ewe is tormented by the pranks of a cow-boy. At one place the ground is drenched with milk streaming from a cow's udders at the sight of her calf, at another place guests are entertained with gifts of pitchers of buttermilk, and elsewhere curds, blades of kusa and dūrvā grass, unbroken rice and flowers are placed on the forehead of a cow back from the woods. calves frightened by the scamper of the young camels who have broken their chains, there the buffaloes stagger under the merciless blows dealt by the young Ābhīras with heavy sticks, and are infuriated by the violent commotion of the fight. At one place the resort of cows with young for the first time is disturbed by the combats of a herd of powerful bulls. At one place the tutelary deities presiding over the threshold of a house are worshipped with the milk of cows with grown up calves, and at another place women with husbands alive, carrying blossoming sprigs, sing auspicious songs at the nuptials of a bull and a cow, while elsewhere the domestic peacocks are made to dance by the sound of the churn staff in the making of curds. Somewhere in the farm the sound of the milking of cows invites wayfarers eager to partake of milk, while elsewhere an old dame comes to the rescue of a boy weeping at being trampled on by a nimble calf that has broken away from the tether."

The elaborate description of the great forest in Book V is interesting chiefly for the vivid portrayal of a variety of wild animals in their natural surroundings (p 198)

At one place the islet of a mountain river looks terrible with the hyenas worried at the sight of the water of the sandy pools being drunk up by the Bhilla boys, exhausted by the constant search for the track of deer. A corner of the forest is covered with the embryos of hunds expelled by the shrill cries of the old boars pierced by the arrows of a band of robbers. At one place the extremities of the thick foliage of trees wither in contact with the sparks shooting up from the the clash of horns in the combats of frenzied buffaloes. At one place the sky is covered with the feathers of buds flying away from their nests, being dispersed by a crowd of monkeys roaming at will. At another place the female crows bring forth their young in the hollows of the old trees shaken by the horrible cries of the compact flocks of screech-owls. In one part of the forest, the movements of the elephant cubs are hampered by the clusters of trees uprooted by violent gales.....Another part of the forest is covered with the leaves of the banana plants cut up by the hooves of the bucks attacked by leopards. At one place antelopes, oppressed by an uncommon thirst, run and lap up the ripples of a mirage. At another place the trees are ghastly with the blood of stags pierced by the horn of some fierce rhinoceros, and all the Rallaka deer are transfixed by the spines of the porcupines moving about freely."

Similar delineation of the wild life of nature is found in the description of the Śiprā river in Book V (p. 208).

"The waters resound with the cries of the water-fowl hovering about in fear of the alligators enraged at the heavy clash of each other's bodies, and the young fish lie hidden under the lotus beds, scared by the movements of the silent cranes, while the gathering of flowers by anchorites is hampered by the water-snakes prowling inside the lotus beds. The frogs keep quiet on hearing the noise of the fierce fights of ferocious water-serpents, and the ripples are darkened by the bees briskly collecting the spreading honey drops oozing from the inner cavity of the lotus blossoms swayed by the surging waves caused by frenzied crocodiles splashing the water with their claws. The waters are overspread with fragments of lilies chewed by fierce hippopotami, and the contiguous rocks of the mountain slopes are fringed with heavy masses of foam floating on the broad backs of the Pāṭhina fish, excited by the splash made by huge tortoises"

Among other descriptions of nature the oncoming darkness is described towards the end of Book III, and Book IV opens with an overwrought picture of sunset and the evening twilight. Elaborate descriptions of the seasons occur in Books I and III, and although the imagery is conventional, there are graphic touches, for example, in the portrayal of the flowers and plants of the rainy season when "the fields are uneven with dense masses of mushrooms; the horizon is pink with blossoms of water-pepper plants; the crevices of mountain rocks are delightfully fragrant with jasmine flowers; the hill tops are adorned with Girmallikā buds, the mountain bowers are gay with Sarja and Arjuna trees, and the leafy petals of the Ketakī flowers glisten, shaped like Cupid's darts." (Book III).

The prose hymns in Book VIII are an interesting experiment in Kāvya prose, and illustrate a Jaina literary genre. They are in the form of elaborate prayers addressed to the Pañca-Paramesthins, the five supreme spiritual leaders of the Jaina church, and are in keeping with the character of Yasastilaka as a Jaina religious romance composed in Kāvya style. The place of these prose invocations in the devotional scheme outlined by Somadeva has been indicated in a subsequent chapter, and it may here be pointed out that each invocation ends with a verse in the anustup metre. There are eight such groups, five addressed to the Paramesthins (Arhat, Siddha, Ācārya, Upādhyāya and Sādhu), and three abstract ones addressed to the Jewels of Right Faith, Right Knowledge and Right Conduct. For example,

"I undertake the eightfold worship of the Exalted Jewel of Right Conduct, preceded by the five Paramesthins, and fivefold in character¹ that produces all good, and culminates in the absolute cessation of all forms of activity. All hail! It destroys the darkness that obstructs the view of the entire universe. It is the Himālaya of unblemished knowledge; the moonrise of festive joy to all living creatures, and the springtime of the creepery grove of all the vows and modes of self-restraint² and vigilance³. It is the nursery of the Kalpa trees of religious austerities that vouchsafe mighty results, and it is practised by those who possess humility, mental calm, a kindly disposition and fortitude. The wise call this Jewel of Right Conduct the first step to the attainment of the supreme goal. Further, intent on Dharma, and for the purpose of vanquishing my enemy, Karma, I resort to the way of life of the Dharmayogin, the best of men. It doth bring happiness to all living creatures."

Somadeva's style is enlivened by the occasional use of popular maxims occurring chiefly in his prose and sometimes also in verses. For example, 'क्षिरो मुष्टमित्वा नक्षत्रप्रदन' (Book IV) Enquiring as to an auspicious date for shaving one's head after one has already finished it. As pointed out by Jacob, Laukhikanyāyāñṣah, Part II, this proverb occurs in the Nyāyamañjarī in the form मुष्टितशिरोनक्षत्रान्वेषणम्. The proverb 'त्रेयासि बहुविघ्नानि' (Book I) occurs at the beginning of a popular verse cited, for example, by Haribhadra at the commencement of his own commentary on his Anekāntayāyapātākā

त्रेयासि बहुविघ्नानि भवन्ति महतामपि । अत्रेयासि प्रवृत्तानां कापि यान्ति विनायकाः ॥

'इतस्तदमितो व्याघ्र केनास्तु प्राणिनो गति' (Book IV). On one side a precipice, on the other a tiger, how can a living creature pass? To be between the devil and the deep sea. This and two other similar sayings are cited in Nalacampū, Book V. 'इतो व्याघ्र इतस्तदी, इतो द्वाभिरितो दस्यव, इतो दुष्टदन्दशक इतोऽप्यन्धकूप' इति न्यायात् १. 'नरकान्त राज्यम्, बन्धनान्तो नियोग, मरणान्त स्त्रीषु विश्वास, विपदन्ता खलेषु मैत्री' (Books VII & V): Sovereignty leads to hell, employment to captivity, trust in women to death, and friendship with villains to danger. 'गतोदके क खलु सेतुबन्ध' occurs in a verse of Book IV. 'स्त्रीत्र हे पुत्र न षड्वलानि' Ibid ⁴ 'को नाम धीमोहवणाम्बुराशेरुपायनार्थं लवणं नयेत' Ibid.

What wise man will carry salt for presenting it to the saltsea? 'इन्द्रियमस्थानं हि गुणदोषयो- मंहीयत' इति नीतिवाक्यम्, Book VII, section 32 The sense, as far as can be judged from the context, seems to be that kings are as liberal as Indra in rewarding merit and as strict as Yama in punishing crime 'राजपरिरुहीतं तृणमपि काञ्चनीभवति' Ibid Even a blade of grass belonging to the king becomes as valuable as gold.
'शठप्रतिग्रहान्धयेन' Book IV, 'अन्धकवर्तकीयम्' Book II, verse 153 The maxim of the blind man and the quail¹ 'को नाम शैलमारोहेदकं लब्धमथु सुधी' Book III, verse 73, is a variation of the wellknown maxim अर्के चेन्मथु विन्देत किमर्थं पर्वतं व्रजेत् discussed by Jacob (op. cit.), Part I. The following maxims bearing on the character of women occur in Book IV स्त्रियं खलेषु रज्यन्ते दासहस्तिपकादिषु' इति, 'अपात्रे रमते नारी' इति क्वचनमस्ति । अत एवोच्यन्ति नीतिवेदिनः - 'तैरश्वोऽपि पुयुगं स्त्रियो दूषयति, किं पुनर्न मानुषः' । The last of these maxims is also cited by Somadeva in Nivvākyaṃṛta स्त्रीणां दौत्यं स्त्रिय एव
कुर्युस्तैरश्वोऽपि पुयुगः ।

Somadeva has an eye for the grotesque, as exemplified in his description of the elephant driver in Book IV and the king's spy in Book III. His power to depict the strange and the terrible is illustrated not only in his remarkable picture of Candamānī and the Mahābhairava temple in Book I but in the description of the scenes of horror conjured up by a Vidyādhara to disturb the meditation of the sage Manmathamathana, in Book V, and the similar scenes created by two gods to test the steadfastness of Jinadatta and Padmaratha in their austerities, in the first story of Book VI. Disease and disgusting conditions are delineated in the story of Auddāyana in Book VI (section 9), while Amṛtamati, stricken with leprosy after her crime, is introduced in a verse of Book V Curious examples of abusive language are found in the story of the Vidyādhara mentioned above, who is discovered in the act of molesting the sage Manmathamathana by the king of the Vidyādharas, and addressed by the latter thus

अरे कदाचाराचार पराकटुरात्मन् खलपुरोभागिन् विद्याधराधम खेचरखेट विहायोगमयाप्य विद्येचरखेल हेठ
भरकनिवास पापाचार बहुकुमतिभृतचित्तं गुणमदह निहीन गन्धर्वलोकापसद मातरिपुरुष

Similarly, in the story of Śrībhūti in Book VII (section 27), the dishonest priest is rebuked by the king in opprobrious language. The incorporation of the religious and moral tales in Books VI and VII gives the author an opportunity of presenting scenes not usually found in Sanskrit prose romances.

1 The translation of the verse in question in chapter XI follows Śrutasāgara's explanation of the maxim Vardhamāna, on Gararatnamahodadhi III, 195, explains it differently.
See Jacob (op. cit.), Part I.

Frequent and sometimes felicitous use of similes is made by Somadeva in his narrative and descriptive prose. Vajrakumāra was, for instance, adorned by his youth, 'just as a desert path is adorned by a shady tree; just as a shady tree is adorned by a pool of water; just as a pool of water is adorned by a lotus-bed; just as a lotus-bed is adorned by a flock of swans; just as a flock of swans is adorned by the company of beautiful women; and just as the company of beautiful women is adorned by the graceful play of love'.¹ After the discovery of Amṛtamati's guilt, Yaśodhara's heart burnt like a tree enveloped by fire; he was furious like the ocean overflowing its shores; he changed countenance like the moon attacked by Rāhu, and trembled like creatures at the approach of death; his lips quivered like a leaf that is being cut to pieces; he frowned like Śiva intent on burning the Three Cities; and his bosom was aglow like a heated cauldron.² The guilty woman, after her transgression, crept back to her husband's bed and slept, clinging to his bosom, like as a female rogue elephant enters a grove of trees, just as a sheet of lightning plunges into a rain-cloud, just as a serpent enters a mountain cave, just as the messenger of death enters the world, just as a crocodile enters the ocean, or a female goblin the dense woods.³ This may be contrasted with another series of similes, in which the conjugal harmony of Candramati and her consort Yaśorgha is likened to the relationship existing between wise policy and a kingdom, forbearance and religious austerities, modesty and learning, fame and life, the Flag of triumph and the god of love, mango blossoms and springtime, the Kalpa creeper and a tree of heaven, and a series of beneficial happenings and a sacred day of religious piety.⁴ A long series of similes occurs also in Yaśodhara's reflections on women as an indispensable factor in the joys of life. Without women, a kingdom is like a forest, ornaments are like the decoration of a dead body, beauty paint is like smearing of clay, adornment of the body is like shampooing a man who is asleep, the flurry of fly-whisks and parasols is like the worship of evil spirits, the practice of the arts is like a device for wasting time, the study of poetry is like an attempt to remove the irritation of the mouth, deliberations in the council chamber are like possession by evil spirits, public audience is like entering a prison, music is like a loud sermon on the futility of life, the sound of drums is like a trumpet proclaiming the banishment of worldly happiness, mansions are like mountain caves, pleasure gardens are like charnel-fields, protecting one's subjects is like wage-earning, conciliation of the citizens is like the rounds of a city barber, execution of the six-fold policy is like the crossing of a dried up river, and the effort to acquire wealth is like dancing in the dark.¹

Yaśodhara's disgust for the world and decision to renounce the world is brought into harmony with the morning scenery in a series of appropriate similes. "The east cleared up like my own decision. The stars vanished like my desire for sovereignty. The lunar orb grew dim like my passion of love. The day lotus beds blossomed forth like the disgust of my heart. The darkness of the night disappeared like my desire for worldly happiness. The glow of the early dawn melted away like the snare of my delusion."²

Rather bold and exaggerated similes are used to praise the Śiprā river in Book V. Its waters are bright as a stream of nectar and beautiful as the oozings from moonstones, and delight the world like the Supreme Light. Abstract similes are sometimes used to describe concrete objects, e. g., in the description of the great forest in Book V: it is impenetrable like the heart of a wicked man, dreadful like the hour of universal destruction, deep like the science of numbers, intricate like the character of a woman, infested with mischievous thorns like a period of anarchy, harmful like a villain's counsel, and inaccessible like the heart of a prince³. Some of the similes are marred by word-play, and a typical example is the comparison of the forest just mentioned to Raghu's family, simply because both happen to contain 'Māgadhi', which, applied to the forest, means a pippali creeper; and applied to the family in question means Sudakṣiṇā, the consort of Dilīpa.⁴ Simpler and more tolerable is the comparison of king Yaśorgha, also based on verbal similarity, to the autumn, the spring and the other seasons.⁵ Similes based on paronomasia are in fact a common feature of the Kāvya style, and it is perhaps significant that Somadeva's romance opens with a long series of similes of this type (śliṣṭopamā).⁶ They are used also in the description of the great tree in the valley of the Suvela mountain in Book V.⁷

1 'विना हि विलासिनीजनेनारण्यमिवेदं राज्यम्, मृतकमण्डनमिवाभरणम्, पङ्कोपदेह इव विलेपनम्, सुप्तसंवाहनमिव शरीरसंस्कारः, प्रकरणमिव चामरातपत्राडम्बरः, कालहरणोपाय इव कलानामभ्यासः, तुण्डकण्डूविनयनमिव काव्याध्ययनम्' etc. Book IV.

Other examples of word-play are not very numerous considering the bulk of the romance. The device is aptly used in the satirical description of the wicked minister in Book III. The spy says, for instance, that the minister is indeed the vardhana or 'promoter' of the prosperity of the kingdom, but the word means also 'cutter', 'destroyer'. Similarly, he is the cause of vbhūti 'glory', but the word means also 'ashes', and he is also the maker of a series of māṅgalas, which means both 'happy events' and 'potsherds'.¹ There is likewise a long series of compounds in Book II, which describes in identical language the condition of kings, both when they are favoured by Yaśorgha and when they incur his displeasure. When, for instance, the great king is displeased with them, then lot is tīthopāsana, i.e. deprived of their kingdoms, they pass their days in sacred places for the practice of religion, but when Yaśorgha is favourable to them, they have tīthopāsana of another kind, i.e. enjoy the loyalty of the various components of the state in full sovereignty of the realm.² Similarly, another series of compounds describes simultaneously a pleasure garden and a crowd of beautiful women in a description of the summer in Book III. Virodhābhāsa and Pañsamkhyās, based on word-play, are also met with, but their number is not large. The description of the royal palace towards the end of Book II contains some highly artificial examples of Virodhābhāsa.

The most typical of the characteristics of the later Kāvya style is, however, exhibited by the use of Utpreksās which are frequently employed in our work. A series of Utpreksās is used, for example, in Book I, to describe a hill, which is fancied as the bosom of Dame Earth, as the play-ball of some sylvan deity, as a sweetmeat ball given to the boyish Regions of the sky by their mothers, as the hump of the Earth Bull, as a mound barring the entrance to the nether regions, and as the supporting roost of the Sky Bird!³ Utpreksās are generally used to give greater perspicuity to an image and make it more striking and graphic, but very often the effect produced is rather bizarre and grotesque, although there are numerous exceptions. Those employed, for instance, to describe Candamāli are quite in keeping with the dread character of the goddess, who is fancied as the younger sister of Yama, as the mother of Mahākāla Śiva, as the messenger of the god of death, as the companion of the Kālāgni form of Śiva associated with the hour of universal destruction, as the stewardess of the kitchen of the awful Mothers¹, as the nurse of the monsters, as the ground where the kinsmen of the god of death worship the Manes, and as the Night of destruction of all living creatures.² Not so successful is the attempt to reproduce the nasty spectacle of a serpent half buried in an anthill. The reptile is fancied as the intestines of the Earth Antelope, as the tail of the Earth Lioness, as the root of the Earth Creeper, as the stalk of the Earth Lily, and as the lock of hair of the Earth figured as a female monster.³

The constant desire to add new images tends to make Utpreksās farfetched and artificial, and sometimes a good image is spoilt by juxtaposition with others less effective. As is to be expected, Utpreksās occur mostly in descriptions, and some characteristic examples are provided by the natural descriptions in our romance. The Sīprā river is, for example, fancied as a girdle of moonstones worn by the city of Ujjayinī like a graceful lady, as the pleasure tank of the mistresses of the king of Mālava, as a festive banner flying over the nether regions, as a nuptial garland for the wayside mountains, as a pearlstring worn by the Earth goddess, as a banner proclaiming the fame of the mountain from which the river rises, and as an irrigation canal for the gems in the ocean⁴. Similarly, in the rainy season the sky seems to be a shower-bath for the earth long scorched by heat, the mountains with the waters of the cascades streaming down their sides appear to have white banners covering their slopes, and the lakes, full to the brim, seem to be ceremonial vessels of water, a parental offering to the Summer dead and gone!⁵ Another series of Utpreksās occurs in the description of the temples of Rājapura in Book I. The tall, white edifices are fancied as clusters of flowers of the Sky tree, as white lights of the firmament, as masses of lotus blossoms adorning the crest of the Sky Goddess, as places for the acquisition of vast religious merit by the pious of the three worlds, as expanses of the foam of the atmospheric ocean, as gleams of the loud laugh of Śiva incarnate as the sky, as crystal pleasure hills of the planetary world, and as elephant cubs of the Sky Forest belonging to the (white) Airāvata family¹

Accumulations of Rūpakas are occasionally met with, for example, in the description of Māradatta as the lover of women of different nationalities.² The lengthy series of epithets, mostly Rūpakas, applied to Yaśodhara in the letter despatched to a rival,³ illustrates a current practice in royal correspondence and inscriptional records of grants and endowments. Some of the epithets are as follows "The Sunrise of prowess; Brahman himself in wisdom, an ocean of discernment, a swan participating in the joyful sports of the goddess of learning, the beloved consort of poetic speech, a Vidyādhara in the game of ball-throwing, an Indra in playing with rutting elephants, an Aruna in chariot-driving, a Garuda in fighting on foot, a Gandharva king in singing, a Bīhaspatī in the science of instrumental music, a Bharata in the art of dancing, a Paraśurāma in self-sacrifice, an axe in the jungle of hostilities, a lion to the 'fawn' of Kalinga⁴, a blaze to the 'bamboo clump' of Aśmaka, a fire to the 'moth' of the Śāka country, a flame consuming the king of Kīathakaisika; the crest-jewel of the Ksatriyas of Ahicchatra, Deathknell to the insubordination of the king of Pancāla, a thunder-bolt to the royal dynasty of Kerala, lightning-fire to the Yavana Tree,⁵ the subject of pleasant disputes among the beautiful women of Cedi, the luxury mirror of the women of Magadha; a tender leaf on the plump bosoms of the ladies of Kāñcī, a love-god to the youthful Ratis of Māhismatī, the beauty-paint of the ruddy lips of the fair women of Kauśāmbī, the ear-ornament of the women of Daśārṇa, the passionate lover of the courtesans of Pātaliputra; a bee enjoying the graceful gestures of the beautiful women of Valabhī, the perfumed ornamental dot on the foreheads of the women of Ayodhyā." A reference to the original will show that most of these epithets are used with an eye to verbal effect, to which Kāvya poets paid considerable attention.

3 See chap. V

4 'Fawn', 'Bamboo clump' and 'Moth' are contemptuous references to the kings of the respective countries

5 i. e. the Yavana king.

The Rūpakas used are not, all of them, equally successful. The courtesan whose dead body forms the subject of the verse description in Book I was 'the pleasure resort of the apish minds of all who are henchmen of the god of love'.¹ The nights of the rainy season are 'the female buffaloes who nourish the child minds of the women going out to meet their lovers'.² A young man who took the help of a nurse in his love affairs is described as having made her a field for the growth of the woodland of his project.³ A certain sage is called 'an elephant engaged in water-sports in the river of learning'.⁴ A particularly bad example is the description of another sage as 'an enclosure for the capture of the elephant herd of religious merit'.⁵

Neglect of proportion is a common characteristic of later Kāvya style, and overelaboration of details often leads to the use of artificial conceits and hyperboles. Somadeva, for instance, devotes no less than twenty elaborate and mostly far-fetched epithets to Māradatta's sword (Book I, p 161), and an almost equal number is applied to the dust raised by Yaśodhara's troops (Book II, p 337). The particles of dust are incidentally likened in an elaborate fashion to lovers enjoying the company of their beloved, because they enshroud and cling to the various limbs of the women accompanying the procession.⁶ The height of the temples of Rājapura is conveyed by saying that 'the showers of water streaming from the conduits made of moonstones, emitting moisture in contact with the rays of the moon, drench the bodies of the nymphs of heaven, withered by the fire of separation from their lovers'.⁷ Sometimes a conceit employed is exaggerated to the extent of producing something like a comic effect. In the description of the great hospitable tree in Book V, for example, the tree is fancied as mockingly addressing other trees in the forest on the subject of their being barren and useless for wayfarers.⁸

One of the topics which makes later Sanskrit writers throw off all restraint is fame, usually the fame of kings. Apart from poetical descriptions of royal fame, Somadeva gives an elaborate picture of the fame of the sage Sudatta (Book I), which illustrates how Kāvya poets seek novelty in the treatment of conventional themes by introducing fanciful images and conceits. The description in question may be summarised thus "The universe having been pervaded by Sudatta's fame, white as the foam of milk, Brahman is anxious lest the white things created by him should be merged in the general whiteness and lost to view. So he devises signs of recognition, and puts the submarine fire in the Ocean of Milk, masses of matted hair on Śiva's head, a dark spot in the form of a deer in the moon, protuberances on the heads of Airāvata and other divine elephants, mineral peaks on the Himālayas, Tamāla trees on the slopes of the Kailāsa mountain, the dark waters of the Yamunā in the course of the Ganges, and yellow filaments in white lotus blossoms, while he prescribes for the Pāñcājanya conch contact with the dark hands of Kṛṣṇa. Sudatta's fame is also represented as a maiden in her nuptial attire, wandering in the universe and rejecting various suitors for her hand on different grounds. She tells Brahman, for instance, that he is too old to accompany her in her travels, tells Agni, the god of fire, that he is hardly fit for marriage, suffering as he does from acute jaundice, and rejects Varuna, the lord of the ocean, because he is disabled by dropsy and hence debarred from the gaieties of love. Vāyu, the wind-god, is too fickle for her, and she tells Kubera, the god of wealth, that a confirmed drunkard like him¹ is not fit to converse with a maiden like her. Śiva who lives near funeral pyres is, of course, ruled out, and she warns the Moon that his life is in danger on account of his incurable consumption, and tells Viṣṇu that, being a baldpate with a scalp resembling an iron cauldron turned upside down, he is not worthy of her kisses². Unable to accept any one of them, Maiden Fame continues to wander without abiding anywhere, like a doe deluded by a mirage, like the mind of a king who has lost his throne, like the intellect of a sage who has attained the inner vision." There is no doubt that this description of fame shows considerable ingenuity, but the reckless elaboration of a favourite theme all but makes it verge on the comic³.

3 Certain other gods are also mentioned, including a vulgar reference to Indra.

An interesting example of Kāku-Vakrokti is found in Amrtamati's fraudulent message to Yaśodhara, in which she begs to be allowed to accompany the king into wilderness after his proposed renunciation of the world. Yaśodhara, while listening to the message, interjects sarcastic remarks which appear to corroborate her statements, but really give them a different interpretation reflecting on her character. Portions of the message may be reproduced here, Yaśodhara's remarks being put within brackets. Amrtamati says. 'I will accompany Your Majesty, just as the tide accompanies the ocean (That is why you are fickle), just as the image of the moon accompanies the sky (That is why you have a black spot¹); just as the shade accompanies a tree (That is why you are enjoyed by others); just as the track accompanies a chariot (That is why you are 'full of dust'²), just as the flame accompanies a lamp (That is why you emit 'smoke'³); just as sylvan beauty accompanies the spring (That is why you are full of Cupid's lore), just as the Ganges is the companion of the Himālayas (That is why you seek a lower⁴ level)'.⁵

Instances of Yamakas are occasionally found. A device used more than once is the Śrnkhalayamaka which consists in the continuous repetition of the last syllables of a series of compounds at the beginning of each succeeding compound. For example,

य खल्वनेकविकिरकुलकामिनीनिशितशिखोल्लेखनखमुखविलिख्यमानशाखाभुजशिखर , शिखरशिखाडम्बरित •
कुपलपर्यन्त , कुपलपर्यन्त •• पल्लवपुटपटल , पल्लवपुटपटलान्तराल •• पथिकसार्थ , पथिकसार्थ •••••
सहचरीनिचय , सहचरीनिचय • छायाच्छन्नतलदेश , छायाच्छन्नतलदेश •••••
As pointed out by Jacobi, the Śrnkhalayamaka is used by Siddharṣi in Upamatiḥbhavaprapaṇcā kathā, p 752. Haribhadra too has used this device in verses in his Samarāṇccakāhā.⁶

The mixture of prose and verse is a salient feature of Yaśastilāka which is one of the two earliest extant Campūs, the first being Trivikrama's Nalacampū written during the reign of the Rāstrakūta Emperor Indra

III in the first quarter of the tenth century. It will be out of place to trace here the growth of Sanskrit narrative composition in mixed prose and verse, the origins of which go back to Vedic literature as well as Buddhist writings in Pāli and Sanskrit. There is, however, no doubt that this form of composition became popular in the Deccan in the tenth century in Sanskrit as well as Kanarese literature.¹ Apart from the romances of Tivikāma and Somadeva, the Kudlur grant of the Ganga king Mārasimha, elaborately composed in Sanskrit prose and verse, and containing a detailed account of the Ganga dynasty, was issued in 963 A. D. about five years after the composition of Somadeva's Yaśastilaka.² As regards Kanarese literature, Pampa wrote his famous works Ādipurāṇa and Pampa Bhārata in mixed prose and verse in 941 A. D., and the campū style continued to be popular in that literature for a long period after. Among notable later examples of the mixed style may be mentioned Nāgacandra's Pampa Rāmāyana (circa 1105 A. D.) and Nemicandra's Līlāvatī (circa 1170 A. D.), 'the earliest known specimen of the Novel, or genuine work of fiction, of the Kanarese language'.³ Somadeva wrote his Yaśastilaka less than two decades after the composition of Pampa's works, and being a native of Karnātaka, he may have been influenced by the prevailing Kanarese literary style of his time. As we have already pointed out, Pampa was court-poet of Anikasaṃ II who reigned at Puligere (Lakshmesvar, Dharwar District), while Somadeva wrote at Gangadhārā during the reign of one of his successors. Another noteworthy point is that most of the Kanarese writers of the tenth century and after were Jainas, and it is highly probable that they as well as Somadeva were influenced by the example of the great Jaina Prākṛit romances in mixed prose and verse, e. g., the Samarāuccakahā of Haribhadra and the Kuralayamālā of Uddyotana⁴ composed in the eighth century. The extensive allegorical novel Upamatiḥavaprapaṇcā kathā of Siddharsa composed in prose and verse in 906 A. D. is an early example of a Jaina romance written in Sanskrit under similar influences, though not in Kāvya style. Comprehensive Jaina narrative works in Prākṛit using prose and verse indiscriminately continued to be written till long after the eighth century, e. g., Gunacandra's Mahāvīracarita (1082 A. D.),⁵ Somaprabha's Kumārāpālāpratibodha (1184

Dialogues in prose and verse add to the interest of Somadeva's work. The controversial dialogue in Book IV has been dealt with elsewhere, and we may refer to the story of Padmā in Book VII, section 31, which is practically in the form of dialogues linked together by brief narrative passages. The story contains two main dialogues cast in a dramatic form which could be easily adapted to the stage. That between the bawd and Padmā is reproduced below. एकदा मुदाता पुण्यकान्तामुद्दिश्य श्लोकमुदाहर्षात् ।

The above dialogue is of interest as presenting a lifelike picture of a procuress attempting to seduce a respectable married woman at the instance of a young man of high social standing. There is some resemblance between the Sanskrit dialogue and the first Mime of the Mimnambi of the Greek poet Herodas, a collection of Mimes or dramatic dialogues of a literary character, composed about the third century B.C.¹ In the Mime in question the bawd Gyllis visits Metriche, a well-to-do young lady, whose husband Mandris² has been away in Egypt for nearly a year, and tries to persuade her to accept a wealthy young man who has vehemently fallen in love with her, and employed the old woman as a go-between. Metriche politely but firmly rejects her proposal and dismisses her with a cheering cup of wine. In both the versions the bawd is an old woman, the husband is or expected to be away, and the passion of the admirer is eloquently described, but the mission ends in failure owing to the loyalty of the young wife. There are, however, important points of difference. The Sanskrit dialogue forms part of a moral and religious tale illustrating the evil consequences of unlawful love, while the Mime is a faithful representation of the seamy side of contemporary life. Further, the sequel is different in the Indian tale, as Padmā, the chaste wife of the priest, instead of dismissing the bawd in a friendly spirit, like Metriche, pretends to accept her proposal, and hatches a plot to trap the young libertine. The Mime is no doubt by far the more realistic in tone and expression, but the treatment, as dramatic dialogue, is no less vivid in the Sanskrit story. Obscure allusions occur in both the Sanskrit dialogue and the Greek Mime. Somadeva employs the ornate style of the Sanskrit drama in prose and verse; while Herodas uses only verse, but in an artificial dialect. The dramatic qualities of the dialogues in the story of Padmā are also present to a lesser extent in the dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother in Book IV, though the importance of the latter is socio-religious rather than literary.

YASĀSTILAKA AS A SOCIO-POLITICAL RECORD

As we have already pointed out, Yasastilaka throws considerable light on contemporary life and society, especially court life and administration, and the available data may be classed under three heads. court life, problems of statecraft and social conditions

COURT LIFE

A glance at the Synopsis and Chapter VII (the section on Court poetry) will show that Books II and III of Yasastilaka contain valuable information on medieval court life, and the conditions described therein are chiefly applicable to an Imperial court, which, as suggested in a previous chapter, could be no other than that of the Rāstrakūta emperors about the middle of the tenth century. Somadeva describes the ceremonies connected with the birth, nuptials and the coronation of the prince, and draws a series of vivid pictures of the various activities of the court. On the intellectual side we have weighty discussions of an academic character sometimes the king listens to an elaborate debate on the guiding principles of policy,¹ sometimes he discusses important verses of the *Arthasāstra*²; or participates in heated debates, winning the applause of the learned by his proficiency in the philosophical systems of Jina, Jaimini, Kapila, Kanāda, Cārvāka and Buddha.³ Interludes in a lighter vein are not wanting. For example, on a certain occasion, while the king is discussing the poetical works of the Mahākavis, a poet named Pandita-vaitandika (Scholar Sophist) comes along and recites an untimely panegyric in his honour, e. g. (3. 271),

हरगिरयन्ति महीध्रा क्षीरोदधयन्ति वार्धयः सर्वे । तव देव यशसि विसरति सौधन्ति जगन्ति च त्रीणि ॥

“Sire, by reason of the expansion of thy fame, mountains turn white like the Kailāsa, the seas turn white as the Ocean of milk, all of them; and the three worlds resemble palaces in lustre!” Finding the king inattentive, he asks discourteously how it is that the sovereign does not recognise a world-renowned poet like him!⁴ The king, however, wounds his vanity by asking him the purport of a difficult verse of Sanskrit poetess which proves to be beyond his comprehension.⁵

5 For the verse in question see Chap. XVIII,

Court poets or rather panegyrists are very much in evidence, and recite appropriate verses on diverse occasions, marriage, coronation etc. Certain of them describe the morning and evening scenery, the beauties of the seasons and the gaiety of court festivals, recount the merits of horses and elephants, and recite panegyrics while the king practises archery in the gymnasium. One of the bards who recites the verses in praise of the rising moon is described as having been a fellow student with the king, and there is no doubt that the presence of these educated versifiers adds to the refinement and cultural atmosphere of the court.

Reference is made in Book II to Committees of Experts (ācārya-pariṣad) for the examination of horses and elephants and their representatives, the Mahāmātra and the Mahāsādhaka, the chief keepers of the royal elephants and horses respectively, who submit to the king detailed oral reports on the characteristics of the elephant and the horse selected for his use. The Mahāmātra appears to be a Brāhmana, being introduced as belonging to the family of Paraśurāma, while the Mahāsādhaka is an experienced soldier, being described as having a body marked with the scars of wounds received in many a battle. Great attention seems to have been paid to elephants. The king himself takes part in the training and arming of elephants, and one of his favourite recreations is the witnessing of elephant-races in the race-courses (*pradhāva-dharam*¹).

The court jester (narma-saciva) does not appear in person in our work, but certain utterances attributed to him contain some home truths about the character of kings (3 254-5).

बद्धपुष्पमिव निसर्गादुणेषु नृपतिः पराङ्मुखः प्रायः । कोश इवात्मविदारिणि निश्चिंशे संमुखो भवति ॥

"The warriors bear the brunt of the fighting, but it is the wirepullers who enjoy the results. Those serving a king from outside undergo all hardship, while those in the inner circle reap the benefits; just as the outer tusks of an elephant do the hard jobs, while the inner teeth are employed in eating. Kings, by nature, turn their backs at merits, just as the flowers of a wreath turn their backs at the string. They welcome the heartless who destroy them, even as a sheath receives the sword that cleaves it."

The minister, the physician, the chef and the priest are mentioned together in one of the morning verses (3 11) recited by the bards, who announce their arrival at the court. The court physician seems to be well-read in medical literature, and admonishes the king in a lengthy discourse on matters connected with physical exercise, food and drink.¹ Astrologers are mentioned in Book II, and they are consulted on the eve of the coronation, and doubtless on many other occasions. The Sthapati or the architect appears in connection with the arrangements for the coronation and the construction of the magnificent pavilion on the bank of the Śiprā.²

The composition of the personnel of medieval courts seems to have been more or less similar in India and elsewhere. Nizami of Samarcand declared about 1155 that a properly constituted court should have four classes of educated men secretaries of state, poets, astrologers and physicians, for "the business of kings cannot be conducted without competent secretaries, their triumphs and victories will not be immortalized without eloquent poets, their enterprises will not succeed unless undertaken at seasons adjudged propitious by sagacious astrologers, while health, the basis of all happiness and activity, can only be secured by the services of able and trustworthy physicians"³ This is a fairly accurate description of the composition of medieval courts, whether oriental or occidental. We are told that "even in the West most courts had their astrologers⁴ by the thirteenth century—the earl of Chester even in the twelfth—and the other three might well be found still earlier, but in a less bureaucratic form." The description is particularly true of the Sicilian court of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries with "its astrologers and poets, its Arab physicians and many-tongued secretaries", and the entourage of the Indian court was not, we presume, materially different, to judge from Somadeva's circumstantial account. As regards secretaries and state officials, we may here refer to the Sandhivigrahins, who appear in our work in the role of secretaries of state, and can be accurately described as 'many-tongued', as will be seen later.

One of the functions of the Sandhivigrahins in our work is to announce the arrival at the imperial court of envoys from foreign courts with presents characteristic of their respective countries⁵ The poetical utterances of the Sandhivigrahins are reproduced below (3 247-46)

"The envoys, despatched by the kings of Kerala, Cola, Ceylon, the Śaka land, Śrīmāla and Pañcāla, and by the lords of Anga, Kalinga and Vāṅga as well as other kings, stand in the courtyard, holding in their hands the choicest products of all their dynastic possessions (They may be told) whether Your Majesty, the lord of the earth, has the leisure to see them or not" "The lord of Kalinga comes to thee with mighty elephants, and the princes of the Indus region have sent thee yonder multitude of horses Here, too, is the lord of the Pāndya country, his hands full of wreaths of large pearls brought as presents." "Ruler of the earth, to see thee the lord of Kāśmīra is at the door with presents of saffron, the ruler of Nepāla with musk, the lord of Kośala with silks, the lord of the Himālayas with large Granthipaina¹ roots, the lord of Kailāsa with moonstones, and the king of Magadha with diverse heirlooms. Sire, command me to do what befits the occasion."

The challenge to various kings, demanding submission, intended to be delivered by Yaśodhara's envoy, is no more than a rhetorical exercise², but interesting data on the reception of envoys from hostile courts and the declaration of war can be gleaned from the episode of the king of Pañcāla described in Yasastilaka, Book III. The Sandhivigrahin enters and tells Yaśodhara 'Sire, Dukūla, an envoy of Acala, king of Pañcāla, has arrived and is waiting at the gate' Thus saying, he ushers in the envoy, and ordered by Yaśodhara, offers him a seat at the proper place after he has paid his respects to the king. The Sandhivigrahin then says: 'Envoy, show to yonder Lord the presents sent by your master. Messenger, deliver the letter,' and both the envoy (dūta) and the messenger (sāsanahara) carry out the instructions. The Sandhivigrahin had already been informed by a spy, living in Acala's capital in the guise of an ascetic under the name of Jābala, that that king had a powerful force of elephants and planned to declare war against Yaśodhara before long. The information supplied by the spy is corroborated by certain indications provided by the articles sent – an iron ball, the letter marked with the emblem of a sword on the outside, and the presents wrapped in four pieces of cloth, or according to another interpretation, an iron ball, and the presents and the letter, both marked with the figure of a sword and four encircling lines.¹ In Nītwākyaṃṛta (Chap. 13) Somadeva refers to these emblems as being present on letters from enemies.² Now, the iron ball symbolized the invulnerability of the sender; the fourfold wrappings or the four encircling lines the 'four-limbed' army consisting of cavalry, infantry, elephants, and chariots, and the sword, of course, the threat of war. It was apparently usual to despatch such symbolic gifts as a prelude to warlike measures; and that it was a very ancient custom, and not confined to India, is shown by the account of the gifts (a bird, a mouse, a frog and five arrows) sent by the Scythian kings to Darius under similar circumstances, as related by Herodotus, Book IV 131.

1 A fragrant root called गन्धिपत्र in Assamese, which is pounded by women to the accompaniment of songs during the night on nuptial occasions among the Assamese people.

2 See Chap. VII

Be that as it may, the Sandhivigrahin is convinced of the war-like intentions of the king of Pañcāla, and considers it useless to examine the insincere presents and the contents of the letter, which was only too likely to proclaim the enemy's glory. Accordingly he puts aside the letter and asks the envoy to deliver his message orally, at the same time threatening him with dire punishment for his unfriendly mission: the nose would be chopped off, the head shaved at random, Bilva fruits tied to the forelock, and a garland of potsherds hung round the neck, besides, he would have to ride a donkey.³ Controlling himself, the Sandhivigrahin admits that no wise man should be angry with an envoy who is bound to report facts. Then addressing the envoy, a Brāhmana, the royal official stresses the futility of further queries, and goes on to say. "The motives of your master are clear from your demeanour. The reason why His Majesty has so long connived at Acala, in spite of his having committed many an act of defiance, is that the kings of his line had long paid homage in the past to His Majesty's forbears. But, now, if Acala seeks for himself the fate of a moth in the flames of His Majesty's might, it would be like desiring to play with the manes of a lion, or decorate oneself with the crest-gems of deadly serpents, or scratch with one's finger-nails the tusks of a rutting elephant, or extinguish with one's hands the fire of the epoch of universal destruction, or swim across the ocean, or traverse the sky with a bound, or lift the Mandara mountain with one's hands, or use the axe Śiva as a mirror, or extract the pearl embedded in the jaw of the Prime Boar¹ for using it as an ornament." Acala, in fact, proud of his own power in destroying the petty enemies of his kingdom, does not even now realise the great king's valour, praised by Indra himself in talks about Kṣatriya heroes (3 403)

The speech of the Sandhivigrahin arouses the martial ardour of the warriors present, each of whom, addressing himself to the envoy, utters a vehement challenge to the king of Pañcāla. Kodanda-mārtanda, for example, catching hold of the envoy's hand, says (3 405-6)

श्रीपदं मित्रपक्षाणां खरदण्डं च विद्विषाम् । देवस्यास्य पदाम्भोजद्वयं शिरसि धार्यताम् ॥

"Hold on thy head His Majesty's lotus feet, a source of prosperity to his allies, but grimly oppressive to his foes. Otherwise, thy head will be decapitated by the arrows of Kodanda-mārtanda (The Sun of the Bow), who vehemently dance on the battlefield, a headless trunk." Karavāla declares, brandishing his sword (3 409-10) अश्वग, साध्ववर्धयताम् ।

"Wayfarer², know for certain, this my sword, consecrated to the purpose of destroying the foeman and his allies, amply gratifies the gods on the battlefield with the blood gushing from the bosom of the man, who is slack in paying homage to my master, being perverted by a sense of overweening pride and irresistible might."

Certain of the champions ask the envoy to deliver threatening messages to the king of Pañcāla, of which the following are specimens being communicated by Trisūla-bhairava and Asama-sāhasa respectively (3. 416 and 320)

इदं त्रिशूल तिसृभिः सिन्धुभिर्मार्गत्रयं वक्षसि ते विधाय । पातालमर्त्यत्रिदिव्यवतारां कर्ता रणे कीर्तिमिमां मदीयः

2 i. e. the envoy

“Three openings will this trident make in thy bosom with its three prongs, and spread my martial fame on earth, in heaven and in the nether regions!”

तुलारणे द्वन्द्वरणे दिवारणे निशारणे कूटरणे परत्र वा । यदि प्रवीरस्त्वमिहैधि मे पुरे न गर्जितैः शौर्यकलेषु कीर्तय ॥

“If thou art strong in duels or in day-war or night-war or deceptive warfare or in other modes of fighting, do thou confront me in any of them. The fame of the valiant is not produced by empty roars”

Throughout this unseemly scene, insulting language is freely used, the king of Pañcāla being referred to as ‘the meanest of all the villains’¹, and the envoy variously addressed as Veda-varavadhika (‘one to whom the Vedas are a burden’), dvijāpasāda, brahmapāndhū, dvija-vamsapāmsāna, or simply as ‘Brāhmaṇa’. Happily the disorder is stopped by the intervention of the commander-in-chief who addresses the assembly. Ye wise men, useless are the shouts of men lacking in proper conduct. The brave and the timorous will be sorted out in war (3 422). Therefore let every one of you control his wrath and desist from offensive language. You, too, Sandhivigrahin, eager to enhance the might of your master, should not give way to emotion. Examine the letter and draft a reply. Examine the presents and prepare counterpresents. Let due respect be shown to all the three (the envoy, the letter and the presents), for the kings speak through their envoys even when they take up arms against each other. Not to speak of the envoys, even their servants should not be insulted. Further, neither one’s own failure nor the success of others depends upon the loud declamations of envoys. They are non-combatant intermediaries and speak as they like” (3 423)

The letter is soon ready, and the Sandhivigrahin reads it out. It is extremely brief except for a lengthy conglomeration of epithets designed to glorify Yaśodhara, and, after a polite and formal prelude, communicates an arrogant message from the commander-in-chief, Vijayavardhana, calling upon the king of Pañcāla to submit, since there is no safety for him whether on the battlefield or in flight. The letter is reproduced in part below:

The episode of the embassy, divested of rhetoric, throws interesting sidelights on court practices in the tenth century, but even the rhetoric cannot entirely be ignored, as it somehow always appears in the background of medieval court life. Diplomatic immunity seems to have been assured by time-honoured custom, but there was nothing to prevent an envoy being subjected to humiliation or open insult. Things were not far different in this respect in the contemporary Byzantine court, to judge from the Legatio of Liudprand, Bishop of Cremona, a Western contemporary of Somadeva, who gives an account of an embassy to Constantinople during the reign of the Emperor Nicephorus Phocas, undertaken on behalf of Otto the Great in 968 A. D. Not only was Liudprand compelled every now and then to swallow affront and offensive language at the Byzantine court, but he also describes how in the same year the envoys of the Pope were actually put in prison for bringing an improperly addressed letter to the emperor. The fulminations of the court officials against the Papal legates may be compared with the threats uttered by the Sandhivigrahaṇ against the envoy of the king of Pañcāla “.. ... Would that one of them were a bishop and the other a marquess! Then we would sew them in a sack, and after giving them a sound beating with rods and plucking out their beards and hair we would throw them into the sea. As for these fellows, their lives may be spared,.....”.¹

The comprehensive report of the spy to the king in Book III is a unique document, to which we will return presently. The review of the army is an important incident of court life, and Somadeva's detailed account of it in the same Book gains in importance from the fact that he describes regiments of soldiers from different parts of India in the king's army.² Somadeva's picture is so minute and lifelike that he must have personally observed the ways of these soldiers, and may be supposed to have witnessed them, if anywhere, in the capital of the Rāstrakūṭa emperors, who possibly included in their armies regiments composed of fighting men of different nationalities of India to meet the demands of their far-flung campaigns beyond the limits of the Deccan. Five regiments in all are described. the Deccan regiment, the Drāmila or South Indian regiment provided with litters, the North Indian regiment of cavalry, the Gurjara regiment of archers, and the Tihut regiment, expert in naval warfare, and well-equipped with elephants, and containing an undisciplined Gauda element. The Tihut, or the Tarabhukta regiment, as it is called, may be roughly described as the Behar and Bengal regiment, and it may be noted in this connection that there is another reference to naval soldiers (taricaranara) elsewhere in the work¹ It will be seen that most of the regiments described are those of foot-soldiers, and the description, on the whole, corresponds to Al Masudi's statement that the Balhara or the Rāstrakūta king's 'horses and elephants were innumerable, but his troops were mostly infantry'² It has, however, been rightly pointed out that the Rāstrakūta cavalry cannot be overlooked, and "the lightning all-India movements of Dhruva, Govinda III and Indra III presuppose a strong cavalry"³ Another noteworthy feature of Somadeva's description of the regiments is the absence of any reference to chariots, although he refers to their fighting qualities in his theoretical work Nītvākyaṃrta. This seems to corroborate the view that chariots as an instrument of war were no longer in use in the days of the Rāstrakūtas⁴

The lighter side of court life is represented by dance exhibitions in the court theatre in connection with the Pūrvaranga ceremony accompanied by hymns to Sarasvatī The king is described as witnessing these performances in company with expert dancers and well-trained exponents of the histrionic art⁵ As is to be expected, certain court festivals are also mentioned the Mahānavamī, the Dipotsava, the Spring carnival and the worship of Makaradhvaja, the god of love⁶

It is hardly necessary to emphasize the documentary value of the second and third Books of Yasastilaka as presenting before us a detailed and vivid picture of Indian court life about the middle of the tenth century Yaśodhara, the hero of the story, is a legendary figure, but the setting of his court has a historical character and reflects the conditions prevailing in the writer's own time It is a curious coincidence that not long before Somadeva composed his imaginative account of Indian court life, the Byzantine Emperor Constantine VII (912-59) wrote his De ceremonis aulae, 'an account of the whole life of the Byzantine polity, with its hierarchy of lay and ecclesiastical officials,' and the traditional ceremonies and festivals, 'from the coronation and burial of an Emperor to the baptism of his son'⁷ The Indian writer would presumably have shared the emperor's idea that 'it is through its glorious ceremonial that the imperial majesty is increased in splendour', and Somadeva was doubtless sufficiently impressed by the grandeur of contemporary court life, which partly explains his treatment of the theme as a pendant to the traditional story of Yaśodhara. But he does more—he deals with problems of administration, a subject in which he is deeply interested.

PROBLEMS OF STATECRAFT

Side by side with the portrayal of court life, Somadeva lays down precepts and principles for the guidance of a monarch, and illustrates them where necessary by means of concrete examples and quasi-historical traditions. From this point of view, Yasastilaka may be regarded as a sort of illustrative commentary on some of the topics dealt with in the formal treatises on the nītisāstra including Somadeva's own Nītvākyāmrta. The latter is a comprehensive work in the form of sūtras in thirty-two chapters, and topics briefly touched in Nītvākyāmrta are often treated in greater detail in Yasastilaka, the two works supplementing each other, so far as problems of statecraft are concerned.

Somadeva lays great emphasis on the paramount influence of the monarch in moulding the character of his subjects, who implicitly follow his example whether it is good or bad. We are told that just as the day and the night cause light and darkness respectively, so is the example of the king the determining factor in the practice of virtue or sin by his subjects (Book IV, p. 95).

अहोरात्रं यथा हेतुः प्रकाशध्वान्तजन्मनि । तथा महीपतिर्हेतुः पुण्यपापप्रवर्तने ॥

Somadeva quotes in this connection a popular verse उक्तं च—

राजि धर्मिणि धर्मिष्ठा पापे पापा समे समा । राजानमनुवर्तन्ते यथा राजा तथा प्रजाः ॥

A similar verse is found also in S'ukranītisāra 4 1 62

सुपुण्यो यत्र नृपतिर्धर्मिष्ठास्तत्र हि प्रजाः । महापापी यत्र राजा तत्राधर्मपरो जनः ॥

The idea is indeed an old one, and occurs in Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā XIII 39, wherein the subjects unhesitatingly following the king's example, good or bad, are compared to cows following the lead of an ox.

जिह्वं शुभं वा वृषभप्रचार गावोऽनुगा यद्गदनुप्रयान्ति । उच्छिस्तशङ्काङ्कुशनिर्विघट्ट प्रजास्तथैव क्षितिपस्य वृत्तिम् ॥

It is interesting to note that the influence of the king's example on his subjects is likewise emphasized in St John Damascene's Barlaam and Ioasaph (Chap XXXIII) a religious romance of the eighth century to which we will have occasion to revert.

"And soothly, the king was a good example to all, and he inflamed and kindled the hearts of many to be of the same mind with himself.

For such is the nature of authority Its subjects always conform to its likeness, and are wont to love the same objects, and to practise the pursuits which they perceive to be pleasing to their governor ”¹

Somadeva goes on to say “Verily the habits and customs of men are based on those of the king And the customary regulations of the different castes and orders of society, leading to religious merit and demerit, are subject to the king’s control The citizens do exactly what the kings do, good or bad, under the influence of passion or anger, or through ignorance ”² Somadeva reinforces his remarks by pointing out how the bad example set by kings is responsible for the existence of evil customs among their subjects For instance, the kings are to blame for the fact that the Brāhmanas of the Vangī kingdom are in the habit of drinking wine, and the Persians commit incest with their mothers, and there is intermixture of castes in Ceylon³ It is difficult to adjudge the historical value of these statements The Vangī country is identified by Śrutasaṅgara in his commentary with Ratnapura, modern Ratanpur, which was the capital of Dakṣiṇa Kosala (Bilaspur District, C P), where reigned a branch of the Cedis of Tripuri⁴ The reference to the intermixture of castes in Ceylon may have something to do with the conversion of the island to Buddhism by Mahinda under the king Devānampīya Tissa, a contemporary of Aśoka, as related in the Mahāvamsa As regards the Persian custom, the Christian Apologist Tertullian (second century A D) says in his Apology IX 16 that the Persians, according to Ctesias,⁵ consort with their mothers⁶

Be that as it may, Somadeva concludes his argument by declaring that just as a good king acquires the sixth part of the religious merit of those who practise virtue, so does a wicked one the sixth part of the sin of those who commit misdeeds

यथैव पुण्यस्य सुकर्मभाजां षष्टांशभागी नृपतिः सुवृत्तः । तथैव पापस्य कुकर्मभाजा षष्टांशभागी नृपतिः कुवृत्तः ॥

5 Ctesias of Cnidus lived many years at the Persian court towards the end of the 5th century B C, and wrote in the Ionic dialect a comprehensive work on the history of Persia

6 Persas cum suis matribus mœceri Ctesias refert.

The idea is not new Yājñavalkya 1 335 says that the king acquires the sixth part of the religious merit of the subjects as a result of governing them with justice,¹ while the Ashtadhyayi 223 10 goes further and says that a king acquires the sixth part of both the merit and the demerit of his subjects²

Somadeva lays great emphasis on the personal supervision of the affairs of the state by the king He says "A king inaccessible to his subjects is misled by those near him and baffled by his enemies The employees, like faithless wives, have, as a rule, no other means of thriving than the troubles of their masters, nor has a master any other means of thriving than by checking the transgression of his employees, like that of his wives"³ Somadeva has in this connection the following verses in Yasastilaka, Book III (3 23-26)

नियुक्तहस्तार्पितराज्यभारास्तिष्ठन्ति ये स्वैरविहारसारा ।
बिडालवृन्दाहितदुग्धमुद्रा स्वपन्ति ते मूढधिय क्षितीन्द्रा ॥

नियोगिभिर्विना नास्ति राज्य भूये हि केवले । तस्मादमी विधातव्या रक्षितव्याश्च यत्नत ॥

"Kings who enjoy pleasures at will, leaving the charge of the kingdom in the hands of officials, are foolish indeed They might as well sleep, leaving the cats in charge of the milk The movement of fish in the water and of birds in the sky might sometimes be known, but the conduct of ministers, inscrutable even in palpable matters, can never be known. Just as a physician exerts himself to aggravate ailments of wealthy patients, so do the officials of a king attempt to create troubles for him. There cannot be a kingdom with the king alone, without any officials, so they have to be created as well as guarded with care "

The necessity of strict control to be exercised by the king over his officials is emphasized also in Somadeva's Nitvākya-mṛta (Chaps. 17 and 18), and there is sometimes close verbal resemblance between the statements in the two works For example, we read in Nitvākya-mṛta (17 38-9, 44)

दुर्दर्शो हि राजा कार्याकार्यविपर्यासमासन्नै कार्यतेऽतिसधीयते च द्विषद्भिः । वेद्येषु श्रीमता व्याधिवर्धनादिव

It may also be noted in this connection that the verse 3. 24 quoted above is reminiscent of the following verses of Kautilya's Arthasāstra II. 9;

मत्स्या यथान्त सलिले चरन्तो ज्ञातुं न शक्या सलिलं विवन्तः ।

युक्तास्तथा कार्यविधौ नियुक्ता ज्ञातुं न शक्या धनमाददाना ॥

अपि शक्या गतिर्ज्ञातुं पतता खे पतत्रिणाम् । न तु प्रच्छन्नभावानां युक्तानां चरतां गतिः ॥

Somadeva opines that the ministers of a king should be men of pure lives, loyal and well-versed in the science of government they should be men of birth and natives of the country¹ A king should not depend upon a single minister, the prosperity of one doing so being compared to a creeper climbing a tree with a single branch Somadeva says in Yasastilaka 3 230

एकामात्रे महीपाले नाल लक्ष्मीर्विजृम्भते । लतायास्तत्र का वृद्धिः शास्त्रैका यत्र शास्त्रिणि ॥

In Nītvākhyāmṛta 10. 82 he expresses the same idea by saying that a tree with a single branch does not cast a large shadow² In the same work (10 71) he recommends that a king should have three, five or seven ministers Yet the destiny of a king often depends upon the character of a single minister Somadeva points out in Yasastilaka 3 242 that Duryodhana, though powerful, was ruined, because he had a wicked minister; while Candragupta, though without any resources, obtained a kingdom, because he had a good minister in Cānakya

The primary duty of a minister is described thus he should protect those of the citizens lacking in fighting spirit and resolution with courage, and take care of those who are poor by charitable actions, and by avoiding all cause of disaffection, he should secure the loyalty of the subjects, infected with sedition, whether latent or manifest in ineffectual outbursts³ The true minister of a king is one who is liked by the army and the allies, upright in matters relating to the country and the treasury, and above all devoted to the king (3 200)

तन्मित्रार्पितप्रीतिर्देशकोशोचितस्थितिः । यश्चात्मनि भवेद्भक्तः सोऽमात्यः पृथिवीपते ॥

The attitude of a minister towards the king should be governed by loyalty tempered with justice (3 241)

य कार्यार्थिनि भूपतावसमधी कार्याय धत्ते धुर यश्चार्थार्थिनि संनयोचितमतिश्चिन्तामणिर्जायते ।

“Unequalled in wisdom, he undertakes the responsibility of executing a task when the king demands action, and acts like the Wishing gem, in conformity with justice, when the king is in need of funds These are said to be the two divine factors governing the loyalty of ministers to their master, and not, o king, the expulsion of the great nor the extinction of the realm ”

Those who are in constant fear of their lives (that is, fear the king), and have no motives of sordid gain in deliberations, are alone fit to be ministers of kings, and not those who are like blood-sucking leeches (Book IV, p. 155)

प्रतिक्षणं संशयितायुषो ये न येष्वपेक्षास्ति च कार्यवादे । त एव मन्त्रेऽधिकृता नृपाणा न ये जलौकासमवृत्तयश्च ॥

Further, a minister should exercise independence of judgment in expressing his views, and his aim should not merely be to please the king Somadeva remarks (Ibid).

प्रज्ञास्ति यः श्रोतृवशेन धर्मं नृपेच्छया यो निगृणाति कार्यम् । अकल्पकामोपचयेन वैद्यस्त्रयस्त एते कालिकालपादा ॥

“He who preaches religion according to the inclinations of his hearers, he who sets forth a project in conformity with the wishes of the king, and the physician who lives by ministering to the desires of his patients: these three are the pillars of the Kali Age !”

Ministers are, however, faced with a dilemma If they followed the wishes of the king, the people might be ruined, while if they acted according to the wishes of the people, they might ruin their own position. Yet it is incumbent on ministers to speak the truth this might only involve their own ruin, but false counsel might bring about the ruin of the state, the king, and themselves as well (Book IV, pp 155-6)

प्रजाविलोपो नृपतीच्छया स्यात्प्रजेच्छया चाचरिते स्तनाशः । न मन्त्रिणां वेधविधायिनीवत्सुखं सदैवोभयतः समस्ति ॥
यतो यथार्थं वदतां नराणामात्मक्षयः स्यात्परमेक एव । राष्ट्रस्य राज्ञो ध्रुवमात्मनश्च मिथ्योपदेशस्तु करोति नाशम् ॥

Somadeva speaks a good deal about ministerial corruption The report of the spy in Book III is designed to show to what length the corruption of a single minister, placed in charge of a province, can possibly go, and it also gives occasion to a large number of verses, attributed to diverse poets, on the supposed villainy of ministers in general¹ The author of Yasastilaka seems to regard the proper control and supervision of the activities of the ministers by the king as the first and foremost requisite in the administration of a state He opines that the evil ways of ministers cease only when the king is strict in determining issues of justice and injustice, if he is lenient, indolent and bent on the pleasures of the moment, the ministers are bound to prove insolent and disloyal (3 196)

सचिवचरितं तत्रैवैतत् प्रशान्यति भूपतौ भवति इह य न्यायान्यायप्रतर्कणकर्कशः ।

सदयहृदये मन्दोद्योगे तदात्वसुखोन्मुखे स्त्रिय इव नृपे दसा भृत्याः कथं न विकुर्वते ॥

The evil consequences of ministerial corruption and misrule are summed up thus (3 197)

प्रकृतिविकृतिः कोशोत्क्रान्तिः प्रजाप्रलयागतिः स्वजनविरतिर्मित्राभ्रीतिः कुलीनजनास्थितिः ।

कुसचिवरते राजन्येतद्भुव ननु जायते तदनु स परैर्दायादैर्वा बलादवलुप्यते ॥

“Sedition among the citizens, depletion of the treasury, decimation of the population, disaffection of kinsmen, hostility of friends, and the emigration of the high-born verily, this is sure to happen when a king is attached to a wicked minister. Thereafter the former is ousted by force by his enemies or by his kinsmen ”

Magnanimity accompanied by pre-eminence is stated to be the sole cause of a king having honest persons to serve him. A king may be poor; but if he is magnanimous, he can have plenty of trustworthy servants. even when a pool of water is dried up, numerous trees grow under its bridge (3 198)

अधनस्यापि महीशो महीयसो भवति भृत्यसंपत्तिः । शुष्कस्यापि हि सरसः पालितले पादपविभूतिः ॥

It is dangerous for kings to incur the displeasure of the people by favouring the unworthy and dishonouring the worthy. Several semi-legendary examples are cited by Somadeva to illustrate the point. A king of Kalinga named Ananga, who had made a barber his commander-in-chief, was pelted to death with clods of earth by the enraged citizens. Similarly, a king named Karāla was killed in the Kerala country for making a gambler his priest, king Mangala was killed in the country of Vangāla for making an outcaste his minister, while in the country of Krathakaisika a king named Kāma met with a similar fate for making the son of a courtesan the Crown prince. On the other hand, in Vaṅga a king named Sphulinga was assassinated for humiliating his honest and sincere minister, in Magadha a king named Makaradhvaja was murdered for despising his pious priest; in Kaunga a king named Kuranga was killed for insulting his powerful commander-in-chief, and in Cedi king Nadiśa was similarly punished for removing his innocent eldest son from the position of heir-apparent¹

Danger to kings lurks also in presents sent by rival courts, which should be carefully scrutinized before acceptance. It is said that king

Dhisana killed king Durdharsa by presenting him with a jewel casket containing a deadly artificial serpent. Another king, Kanapa¹ by name, killed a rival named Kipana by sending him a perfumed cloth for covering idols which was coated with a deadly poison². These stories are also mentioned with slight variations in Nitvākhyāmṛta (Chap 13) wherein we are told that a king of Karahāta named Kaitabha killed king Vasu by presenting him with a marvellous cloth perfumed with a deadly poison, and a king named Karavāla killed king Karāla by sending him a jewel casket containing a venomous serpent³. Somadeva clearly says in the latter work that letters and presents sent by an enemy should not be accepted without being examined by trustworthy persons (13. 15).

A king should also be on his guard in his relations with women. This is, as a matter of fact, one of the lessons of the romance, and the subject is also treated in detail in Nitvākhyāmṛta (Chap 24). The direction given in the latter work (24. 32) that nothing coming from the ladies' apartments should be eaten by the king has a direct bearing on the story of Yaśodhara. Free and careless association with the inmates of the harem is held to be a source of danger to the king (Book IV, p. 153).

अन्तःपुरे भूमिपतिर्मदान्धः करोति यः संगतिमङ्गनाभिः । तस्य ध्रुवं स्यादचिरेण मृत्युर्विलम्बप्रवेशादिव दुर्दुरस्य ॥

"Verily, the king who, blind with passion, associates with women in the inner apartments, soon loses his life, like a frog entering a serpent's hole."

The idea occurs also in Nitvākhyāmṛta—

दुर्दुरस्य सर्पगृहप्रवेश इव स्त्रीगृहप्रवेशो राज्ञः । 24. 31.

Further, both works record a number of traditions, with slight variations, to illustrate how kings are sometimes assassinated by women with devices of their own. For instance, in the Yavana country a queen named Manikundalā killed king Ajarāja (Angarāja) by giving him a mouthful of poisoned wine, in order to place her son on the throne. In the country of Sūrasena, Vasantamatī killed king Suratavilāsa by kissing him with lips painted with poisoned red lac. In the Daśārṇa country Vrkodari killed king Madanārnava with her girdle-jewel smeared with poison. In Magadha, Madirāksī killed king Manmathavinoda with a sharp-edged mirror, and in the Pāndya (Pāndu) country Candarasā murdered king Mundira (Pundarika) with a dagger concealed in the lock of her hair¹

3 मणिकरुण्डकविन्यस्तवपुषा कृत्रिमेणाशीविषविषधरेण (Yasastilaka), आशीविषविषधरोपेतरुण्डकप्राश्रुतेन (Nitvākhyāmṛta). Envenomed gifts are familiar in Greek literature. In one version of the story of Medea she kills her rival Glauce by presenting her with a poisoned robe and crown. Cf Euripides, Medea, 1116 sqq and Diodorus Siculus, IV. 54. 6. The death of Heracles caused by 'the deadly robe' unwittingly sent by his aggrieved wife is the theme of the Trachiniae of Sophocles.

The danger from women is also illustrated by asserting that it is risky to educate them. Yaśodhara says in Book IV (p 152).

इच्छन् गृहस्यात्मन एव शान्तिं स्त्रियं विदग्धा खलु कं करोति ।

दुग्धेन य पोषयते भुजङ्गी पुंस कुतस्तस्य सुमङ्गलानि ॥

“Who doth ever make a woman excel in wisdom, desiring his domestic peace? How can a man, who nourishes a serpent with milk, profusely thrive?” This is not merely the opinion of a disillusioned husband. Somadeva makes a similar observation in Nitvākhyāmṛta 24. 43. नातीव स्त्रियो व्युत्पादनीया स्वभावसुभगोऽपि शास्त्रोपदेशं स्त्रीषु शस्त्रीषु पयोध्व इव विषमता प्रतिपद्यते ।, and the statement, in fact, occurs also in Yasastilaka, Book IV.²

Further, we are told that women may have as much freedom as they like in the discharge of their duties towards their husbands and children, but must not interfere in matters which properly belong to men's sphere, their minds being extremely fickle and superficial, like a drop of water on a lotus leaf. No one who accepts the participation of women in activities other than domestic duties can thrive for long, being like a tree fallen into the current of a river. And it is under a man's control that a woman can achieve her desired end, like a sword in the grip of a man³. These statements are put in the mouth of Yasodhara, annoyed at the importunities of his mother in behalf of animal sacrifice, and remind one of the words of Eteocles, in Aeschylus' Septem Contra Thebas (200, 201), that 'outside affairs are men's business—let woman not advise thereon'. It may be added that the gist of what Yaśodhara says occurs also in Nitvākhyāmṛta (Chap 24)⁴

The narrow view of women's character and capacity to which Somadeva here gives expression should be considered in relation to what is called rājaraśā or protection of kings, and is in keeping with the precaution against familiarity with women recommended as a measure of self-defence. There are no adequate grounds for holding that Somadeva is a misogynist. It is noteworthy that almost all the attacks on women in Yasastilaka are put in the mouth of Yaśodhara and the Jain ascetic Sudatta, appropriately enough, it would seem. Somadeva refers also to the Digambara Jain doctrine that women are unfit for salvation¹, but he declares in emphatic terms that women are superior to men in the intellectual field (1 146)

देहायते कर्मण्ययं नर स्त्रीजनोऽयमिति भवति । चित्तायते कर्मण्यधिका नारी तु मध्यमः पुरुषः ॥

"Discrimination between men and women is valid in respect of physical activity. But women are superior and men inferior in intellectual activity." It may also be noted that Somadeva as a practical thinker tells us in Nivāḥyāmṛta that women are neither good nor bad, they are, like the Ocean of Milk, the source of poison as well as nectar (24. 10), and have neither any innate merit nor blemish, but become just like their husbands, as rivers assume the character of the ocean when they are merged therein (24. 25). The Jain author's position with regard to women is, in fact, similar to that of Kalhana as stated in a verse of his Rājataranginī (VII. 856).

व्रजति रजनी त्यक्त्वा कापि क्षये क्षणदाकर पदमुपगतस्यास्तं संध्या रवेरनुगच्छति ।

इति परिणतौ प्रेमण्युच्चावचे परिचिन्तति क्वचन नियमान्निन्द्या वन्द्या न वा सुधियां स्त्रियः ॥

The guiding principles of a king's policy in matters affecting peace and war, and, generally speaking, his relations with other kings are expounded in an academic discussion in verse in Book III². The framework of the discussion is provided by an examination of the relative claims of dāna and purusa-kāra, a subject bearing on rājadharmā, as already recognised in early texts like Yājñavalkya (1 346 ff). The king is also recommended to rule the kingdom, as a gardener looks after the garden (3. 107).

वृक्षान् कण्टकिनो बहिर्नियमयन् विष्टेयन् संहितानुत्खातान् प्रतिरोपयन् कुसुमिताश्विन्वंलघून् वर्धयन् ।

"Skilled in devising ways and means, rule the earth, like a gardener, a king expelling the petty enemies, like thorny plants, disuniting the united, replanting the uprooted, collecting dues from the well-to-do, as a gardener gathers flowers from the blossoming trees, elevating the lowly, as a gardener rears the smaller plants, humbling the high-born, as he bends the tall-growing ones, reducing the great, as he thins out the thick under-growths, and levelling the mighty, as he fells the lofty trees " No enemy, however small, should be neglected (3 108)

स्वल्पादपि रिपोर्बीजादश्चस्येव शाखिनि । भय जायेत कालेन तस्मात् कस्तमुपेक्षते ॥

"Even from the tiny germ of an enemy there might be cause of fear in the course of time, just as there might be danger to other trees even from a small seed of the Pippal Who can therefore neglect an enemy?"

The duties and qualifications of various officials of the king are dealt with by Somadeva in Yasastilaka as well as Nitwākhyāmṛta. The Dūta or envoy should be an aged Brāhmana, learned, eloquent, forbearing in face of provocation and amiable he should be efficient, courageous, pure, wise, bold and readywitted (3 111). Even when an envoy is entrusted by his master with a provocative message, he should regulate his speech according to the temperament, character, or the resources of the king to whose court he is sent. To a proud enemy he should speak in conciliatory terms. To one well-versed in polity he should talk about principles. To one who is powerful he should speak about dissensions among his subjects, while to an enemy inferior in resources he should talk in terms of war. The responsibility of an envoy is shown by the fact that the prosperity of a king, however great, is endangered by the misconduct of envoys that are greedy and rough in the manner and content of their speech (3 114-5).

The commander-in-chief should be brave, experienced in the practice of arms and well-versed in the Arthaśāstra. He should be a skilled fighter, and well-provided with elephants, cavalry, infantry and chariots, and loyal to his master, and popular with the army (3. 245).

The Sandhivigrahin, 'officer in charge of peace and war', may be called the Secretary of state for foreign affairs. He is an important court official with varied functions. In Somadeva's romance, as we have seen above, he receives the envoys of friendly courts and ushers them into the king's presence, and deals also with the envoy of a hostile court, addresses him, and drafts a threatening letter to the enemy. The Sandhivigrahin is thus in charge of matters affecting peace and war, and he seems to be in close attendance on the king, for we find Yaśodhara in Book IV questioning the Sandhivigrahin about the sudden peals of music in the city¹ In Rājataranginī 4 137-8 we have another glimpse of the functions of the Sandhivigrahin in the person of Mitraśarman, styled as the Sāndhivigrahika of Lalitāditya, king of Kashmir, who is present at the drafting of the treaty between Lalitāditya and Yaśovarman of Kanauj, and objects to the latter's name being recorded prior to his master's in the document in question² In Bāna's Harsacarita (Book VI) we find Harṣa, after his decision to punish the king of Gauda for treachery, dictating to his Sandhivigrahin Avanti, called Mahā-sandhi-vigrahādhikṛta, an arrogant proclamation calling upon all kings to accept his suzerainty or prepare for battle It seems that there were sometimes more than one Sandhivigrahin in the same court Somadeva, for instance, records what he calls 'the verses of the Sandhivigrahins' in the court of Yaśodhara.³ The occasional addition of the epithet Mahā to the usual designation shows that there was sometimes a chief official of that class Among the new offices created by Lalitāditya (first half of the eighth century), as related in Rājataranginī 4 142, mention is made of a Mahā-sandhi-vigraha, which is also the appellation of Harṣa's secretary for foreign affairs, as stated above It may also be noted that one of the verses quoted from Vyāsa in Aparāika's commentary on Yājñavalkya 1 319 refers to a Sandhi-vigraha-lekhaka, obviously the same as Sandhivigrahin, but his function is to draft records of grants of land made by the king It would appear that the Sandhivigrahin was a Secretary of State whose functions were not confined to the conduct of foreign affairs. Somadeva tells us that he should be able to read, write, narrate and interpret all scripts and languages he should be ready-witted and capable of gauging the relative strength of his own master and other princes (3. 250)

The Āksapatalika or the keeper of the state records is mentioned in connection with the challenge to other kings (3 112, 113) issued by Yasodhara,⁴ similar to the one issued by Harṣa in Bāna's romance (see above). The Āksapatalika is here commissioned to read out the message to the envoy who was expected to deliver it to the kings in question⁵ The

Aksapatala, to judge from certain references in the Rājataranginī, was the royal archive containing the records of grants and deeds of gift, and the official who drafted the deeds of gift or made the necessary entries was called Pattopādhyāya¹ The same work (5 301) mentions an Aksapatalādhīśa, chief of the record office, obviously the same as Āksapatalika

Great importance is attached to the rôle of spies in the king's government, and they are regarded as a sort of second sight for him² The report of the spy in Book III provides a concrete example of the kind of information available to kings from this source, and gives us an idea of how minute and comprehensive such information could be The importance of spies is stressed in the following verses of Yasastilaka (3. 116-7)

सर्वचेतोगतानर्थान् द्रष्टुं येषां कुतूहलम् । ते भवन्तु पर चरैश्चक्षुष्मन्त क्षितीश्वरा ॥
चारसंचारतो येषां नाध्यक्षा स्वपरस्थितिः । नियुक्तारातिसंपातात्तेषां नार्थो न चासवः ॥

"Let those kings, who have the curiosity to visualise what is in the mind of every one, have spies only for eyes Those who are not aware of the situation of themselves and others, through the movements of spies, are deprived of both wealth and life by the action of their officials and foes "

The institution of spies is treated in great detail in all ancient works on Indian polity Manu (7 223) and Yājñavalkya (1. 330), for instance, lay down that the king should listen to the reports of spies after the evening ablutions, and, as Manu says, indoors, and the king should be armed while doing so Yājñavalkya (1 338-9) suggests what action should be taken by the king in regard to his officers on the reports of spies those who take bribes, for instance, should be dispossessed and exiled Espionage is dealt with in several chapters of Kautilya's Arthasāstra, on which Somadeva's own treatment of the topic in Nītivākyāmṛta is based In Yasastilaka, too, he is indebted to Kautilya (Chap XI) in the description of Yaśodhara's spy, disguised as a religious mendicant, and surrounded by disciples who proclaim his mystic powers³ The expression siddhah sāmēdhikah occurring in Yasastilaka, Book III, is taken from Kautilya (op. cit.), and the topic is, of course, elaborated in the romance. As regards the report of the spy on the corruption of one of the ministers of Yaśodhara, analysed elsewhere (Chap II), its prototype may be found in the Mahābhārata (Śāntiparva, chap 82) in the story of the sage Kālakavṛkṣiya, who, taking with him a crow credited with the power of soothsaying, goes round the capital of the king of Kosala and observes the evil ways of his ministers, and later reports to him all details of their corruption and conspiracies.

Reference is made in Book III to the Chief of the secret agents called Varisthaka¹, and it is he who reports to the king the arrival of the spy from his town² Śrutasāgara in his commentary seems to take Varisthaka as a proper name, but in Book IV we find a Varisthaka named Vaikunthamati, who brings, however, an ordinary message to the king³ The spy in his report mentions also a chief of the emissaries or couriers (jaṅghācārīka-nāyaka)⁴ Śrutasāgara and Ms A, however, explain the term jaṅghācārīka as a cārapuruṣa, herika, a spy⁵ The forms jaṅghārīka and jaṅghākarīka occur in Arthasāstra II I, but there the word is taken to mean 'messenger' or 'courier'⁶ It is difficult to determine the exact significance of these terms, but there is no doubt that the Criminal Intelligence Department had many ramifications, and was as important in the tenth century as it was in the days of Kautilya.

We have already referred to Somadeva's description of the regiments of Yaśodhara's army in connection with the review of troops, which is included by Yājñavalkya (1 329) in the daily routine of the king In Nīṭivākyāmṛta 22 17 the king's neglect to review the troops personally is described as one of the causes of the disaffection of the army

Elephants and horses were two principal components of old Indian armies; and a number of verses occurs on the importance of the military rôle of these animals (2. 176, 180)

When, at the time of battle, a mighty elephant proudly begins to charge, stepping to and fro, and turning to the right and to the left, with all possible movements, the foeman's elephants are ere long pierced, the horses crushed, the chariots scattered, and the infantry reduced to pulp. The speed of elephants is praised in Yasastilaka 3 309, and Somadeva, the writer on polity, goes as far as to offer salutation to elephants (2 169)·

A large number of technical terms appertaining to elephant lore is used in Books II and III. In the latter Book Somadeva enumerates the different methods of treatment applied to rutting elephants,¹ and gives the names of certain kinds of elephants and the particular states of intoxication to which they are subject. For example,

| Names of elephants | States of intoxication |
|----------------------|------------------------|
| Vasumatitilaka | Samjāta-tīlakā |
| Pattavardhana | Ārdra-kapolikā |
| Uddhatāṅkuśa | Ādhonibandhinī |
| Paracakra-pramardana | Gandhacālinī |
| Ahitakula-kālānala | Krodhinī |
| Carcarivatamsa | Ativartinī |
| Vijayasekhara | Sambhinna-madamaryādā |

The above details are in our work reported to the king by an army commander, and elephant-lore, like the science of horses, was regarded as an auxiliary branch of statecraft in view of the important part played by elephants in warfare.

Like elephants, horses are also praised for their utility in war, and mention is made of various characteristics of efficient chargers. Particularly good are the well-trained ones with well-proportioned, symmetrical and compact limbs (2 206)² Good horses have large foreheads, mouths depressed on the outside, smooth skins, stout shoulders, long legs, broad backs and lean bellies (2 203)¹ Their colours are like those of pearls, or blue lotuses, or gold, or filaments of flowers, or collyrium, or bees, or the rising sun, or Aśoka flowers, or parrots. The neighing of good horses is deep like the trumpeting of elephants, or the roar of lions, or the bellowing of oxen, or like the sound of trumpets, drums or clouds, and the smell of lotuses, blue lotuses, Mālati flowers, clarified butter, honey, milk, or the perspiration of rutting elephants is present in their perspiration, mouths and ears (2 197-9)

Questions of food and drink are discussed in relation to health and physical well-being in a large number of verses (3 321-74) attributed to the court physician Sajjana, alias Vaidyavidyāvilāsa, to whose words the king listens at meal-time. Sajjana is also described as one who gives instruction in the art of producing sixty-three varieties of flavours by primary and secondary combinations of the usual six,² and Śrutasaṅgāra in his commentary gives a formidable list of these combinations. Sound dietetics is a subject intimately connected with the welfare of the king, and accordingly given a place in Somadeva's discourse on the art of government.

Sajjana says many sensible things. Addressing the king, he remarks that just as food is not well cooked in a vessel that is neither covered nor stirred, so a man who has neither sleep nor exercise cannot digest what he eats (3 322). He who gorges himself with food gluttonously even when he is not hungry stirs up diseases, like dormant snakes, for his own ruin (3 329). All stale food with the exception of clarified butter and liquids, food containing hair or worms, and véchauffés should be avoided (3 344), and one should also abstain from overeating, undereating, eating of combinations of hygienic and unhygienic food, and eating immediately after eating (3 345)³

Certain kinds of food are recommended for particular reasons. In the autumn one should take sweet, bitter and astringent things, in the rainy season and the winter sweet, salty and sour things, in the spring pungent, bitter and astringent things, and in the summer mild preparations (3.349). Again, in the winter one should take fresh food, preparations of milk, pulses, and sugarcane, curds, and things prepared with ghee, and oil, too, is beneficial (3 350). In the spring one should take food consisting chiefly of barley and wheat, and containing little ghee, and avoid heavy, cold and sweet dishes (3 351). On hot days one should take Śālī rice, Moog soup containing ghee, lotus stalks, fresh shoots and bulbs, fried barley flour, sherbets, curds mixed with sugar and spices, coconut-milk, and water or milk with plenty of sugar (3.352). In the rainy season the food should be dry light, oily and warm, and preparations of old Śālī rice, wheat and barley should be taken (3.353). In the autumn the diet should consist of ghee, moog, Śālī rice, powdered wheat, preparations of milk, patolas, grapes, Āmalakī fruits, sugar, and sweet bulbs and leaves (3 354).¹ A number of vegetables including slices of fresh ginger is praised in 3.356², and the properties of ghee, curds, butter and milk are described in verses 3 360-63. We are also told that the constant eating of over-sweet dishes leads to indigestion, too much of salty food causes weakening of vision, extremely sour and pungent dishes lead to physical decay, and any unhygienic food causes loss of strength as soon as it is taken (3 364). Certain remedies are suggested for indigestion (3.366), and emphasis is laid on the proper use of water. Water is called both amṛta and viṣa; properly used, it is amṛta, nectar, and used without proper care, it is viṣa, poison (3 368). Transparent water without any taste and smell, and swept by wind and sunshine, is beneficial by nature; in all other cases water should be boiled before drinking. Water exposed to the rays of the sun and the moon should not be used longer than a day and a night, water boiled in daytime should not be taken at night, and water boiled at night should not be taken in daytime (3 370-1)

Examination of food and detection of poison is dealt with in a number of verses; and the subject has, of course, an important bearing on the safety of the king, and is exhaustively dealt with in Kautilya's Arthasāstra I. XXI. Speaking of poison, the court physician mentions certain phenomena indicating its presence in food. He observes that, at the sight of poison, crows and cuckoos cry in an unwonted fashion, mungooses and peacocks are overjoyed, the Krauñca bird sleeps, the cock crows in a harsh tone, the parrot vomits, and the monkey evacuates bowels, while the eyes of the Cakora bird lose colour, and the goose limps. Besides, flies do not settle on food containing poison (3. 338-9). Addressing the king, Sajjana further remarks that fire crackles in contact with food mixed with poison, as it does when a quantity of salt is thrown into it (3. 340).

Certain kinds of food are forbidden under given circumstances, for example, germinating paddy, and ghee kept in a brass vessel for a period of ten days (3 341). Further, bananas should not be taken with curds and butter-milk nor milk with salt, nor broth of pulses with radishes, fried barley powder should not be taken when it becomes compact like curds, and all sesamum preparations are prohibited at night (3, 342-43).

The discourse on food and drink shows the importance attached by Somadeva to a proper understanding of dietetics for the safety and physical wellbeing of the king and the efficient discharge of his duties¹. It shows also the Jaina teacher's keen interest in the secular branches of study.

It is evident that Somadeva in Yasastilaka does not go over the entire range of topics dealt with in the nitisāstras, but rather concentrates on problems affecting the king personally and the rôle played by him in the administration of the state. Considered from this point of view, the relevant portion of Yasastilaka reminds one of the Mirrors or manuals of instruction for the guidance of kings, which were widely prevalent in the Middle Ages in the West, such as the book of Agapetos, the tutor of the Emperor Justinian (sixth century A. D.), and specially the famous Secretum Secretorum attributed to Aristotle, many versions of which are known to exist in different languages.² There are, for instance, Latin texts not earlier than the twelfth century, which 'in their turn rest on Arabic originals'. We may here refer to two English versions, the first from a shortened French source, the second from a Latin source made soon after 1400 A. D.³ The Prologue to the first version tells us that the book was translated from Greek into Syriac, and thence into Arabic. It is interesting to find that although Somadeva's discourse is far more systematic and methodical, and more intimately connected with the actual problems of administration, there are certain noteworthy points of resemblance between his work and the Secretum Secretorum. Firstly, as in Yasastilaka, the king is warned in the Secretum Secretorum never to trust a woman, and it is also pointed out that many kings have been poisoned, a woman's hate being the worst poison.⁴ Secondly, both works treat of questions of health and food and drink, and proportionately speaking, the Secretum seems to attach even greater importance to the subject than our text. Both works deal with the seasons and the kinds of food appropriate to each of them,¹ and the Secretum, too, speaks of forbidden combinations of food, e. g., milk and flesh.² Thirdly, the qualities of secretaries, messengers, and counsellors are dealt with in the Secretum as in Yasastilaka, although the subject is treated far more exhaustively by Somadeva with concrete details and illustrations. The opinion of the Secretum that the king should have five counsellors, or not less than three, if five are not available,³ may be compared with Somadeva's recommendation in Nītvākyaṃṛta that the number of ministers should be three or five or seven. On the other hand, the author of Yasastilaka does not evince any interest in certain topics dealt with at length in the Secretum e. g., physiognomy, miraculous properties of plants, magic stones etc.

It is a noteworthy feature of Somadeva as a political thinker that he divests himself of his theological bias while treating of the problems of the state. For example, as an exponent of Jaina doctrines he severely condemns the Lokāyatika or materialistic view of life,⁴ but in Nītvākyaṃṛta 6 33 he declares that a king conversant with the Lokāyatika system is capable of exterminating the malefactors of the state. Similarly, while emphasizing the importance of Dharma, he declares in the same work that he who solely devotes himself to Dharma, overriding the claims of Artha and Kāma, is like a man who tills a forest, abandoning a ripe cornfield (1. 44). It is also noteworthy that at the beginning of Nītvākyaṃṛta Somadeva offers obeisance not to the Arhat but to the State (Rājya), and his method of approach to the problems of government is certainly not that of a Jaina theologian but that of an unbiassed thinker with considerable knowledge and experience of the affairs of the state. The non-theological attitude of the Jaina author in matters affecting the state may be contrasted with the outlook of certain Western political thinkers of the Carolingian age, who were Churchmen and 'approached the questions at issue through theology'.⁵ The aim of writers like Smaragdus, Jonas and Sedulius, who paid attention to the problem of government in the first half of the ninth century, and wrote hortatory treatises, contrasting the good and the bad ruler, is, generally speaking, to produce, 'as it were, manuals of Christian ethics for Christian rulers'. Admonitions such as that 'the Christian ruler must trust in divine aid rather than in his own courage and that of his troops' would have appeared highly incongruous to the Jaina thinker.

Somadeva's ideal of kingship is evident from his description of the life of Yaśodhara as a ruler. In presenting before us a picture of his activities, the author of Yasastilaka does not attempt to make him a paragon of virtue or even a hero, but is content to depict him as a prince diligent in discharging the duties that devolve upon him as the ruler of the state. Yet he came to an untimely end, because of his failure to take precaution against a woman's perfidy; and his example is intended to be an object lesson for other kings to profit by. Yaśodhara, as represented by Somadeva, is very different from the Syrian king, mentioned by Dio Chrysostom,¹ who spent his life indoors with eunuchs and concubines without even a glimpse of army or war or assembly at all. It may be noted that Dio insists on virile pursuits for the king, and considers hunting to be the best recreation for him.² Yaśodhara does not indeed indulge in hunting, but we see him training elephants and armouring their tusks and practising archery. More questionable is his participation in the summer sports and the gaudies of moonrise in the company of young women, as described in Yasastilaka, Book III, but this may be regarded as a concession to prevailing custom and the conventions of kāvya poetry, and is certainly contrary to Somadeva's considered opinion against the association of the king with the women of the harem.

Somadeva's discourse on the problems of government in Yasastilaka is doubtless unparalleled in kāvya literature, but it should be remembered that earlier poets like Bhāravi, Māgha, Bhatti, and Ratnākara also deal with aspects of Nīti especially in relation to matters affecting peace and war, while Bāṇa's interest in the duties and responsibilities of kingship is revealed in Śukanāsa's advice to Candrāpīda. Further, Bāṇa, like Somadeva, records in Harsacarita, Book VI, a large number of semi-legendary traditions illustrating the mortal danger to kings from carelessness and risky adventures and from the machinations of women. Somadeva and Bāṇa both seem to draw on earlier sources, as similar stories, for instance, those about women murdering kings, are also found in Kautilya's Arthasāstra I. XX and Kāmandaka's Nītisāra 7. 11. 51 ff.

SOCIAL DATA

The interesting data concerning religious conditions in the tenth century, preserved in our text, constitute a large mass of information which has been analysed in subsequent chapters; and we may here confine ourselves to Somadeva's references to social conditions proper.

The charges brought by the spy against the king's minister, a provincial governor, in Book III, point to certain potential abuses of the times, and similar incidents are mentioned also in Rājataranginī. The spy, for instance, says (3. 172)

वापसमयेषु विष्टिः सिद्धायः क्षीरकणिशकालेषु । लवनावसरेषु पुनः स्वच्छन्दः सैनिकाबाधः ॥

The minister is alleged to be responsible for three things. demanding unpaid labour at the time of sowing, collection of dues while the ears of corn are still unripe, and the unbridled movement of troops at the harvesting season. In Nītvākyaṃṛta 19 15, 16 Somadeva says that the collection of dues (siddhādāya) while the ears of corn are unripe depopulates a country, and the movement of troops at the time of harvest leads to famine¹ As regards unpaid or forced labour (visṭi), it goes back to early times, and Kautilya says in Arthasāstra II I that the king should protect agriculture from the abuses of fines, forced labour, and taxation.² Forced labour seems to have been the poor man's terror, as we learn from the parable of the foolish son in Saddharmapundarika, wherein the vagrant youth comes after years to beg at the mansion of his wealthy father, and taking the latter for a king or a grandee, fears lest he should be detained to do forced labour, and slinks away in a hurry.³ The grant of a village sometimes carried with it the right to unpaid labour within the area granted. A record of the Rāstrakūṭa king Indra III, dated 915 A. D., grants, for instance, a village called Tenna to a Brāhmaṇa with the accompanying right to forced labour as occasion presents itself.⁴ Somadeva, it should be noted, takes exception to forced labour only at the time of sowing.

It is also alleged by the spy that Yaśodhara's minister misappropriates agrahāras and *devabhogas*⁵ Agrahāras are villages granted to Brāhmaṇas, and devabhogas are temple endowments (villages, cornfields etc.), and the two terms are sometimes mentioned together, e. g., in the aforesaid grant of Indra III (verse 24). It was, of course, an abuse of power to rob the grantees of their legitimate rights, and similar instances are also recorded in the Rājataranginī. For example, during the reign of Avantivarman (855-883 A. D.) a powerful feudal baron was beheaded under the orders of the minister Śūra for the crime of robbing the temple of Bhūteśa of villages (5. 52ff). Some of the later kings of Kashmir were themselves notorious for such usurpations, notably Śamkaravarman (883-902 A. D.), Kalaśa (1063-89 A. D.), and Harsa (1089-1101 A. D.). Kalhana deplors the fact that Gauraka, the aged and virtuous minister of Harṣa, accepted the post of Arthanāyaka (Prefect of Wealth) for the confiscation of the villages and the entire property of all the temples of the gods (7. 1103-4).

The next charge against the minister is that he melts down the images of the gods and replaces them by those of lesser value, he also sells an image, and with the proceeds institutes a religious festival¹. The motives of the minister are evidently not only cupidity but a show of piety. Be that as it may, the practice of melting down images by greedy monarchs is wellknown in history and found not only in India but also elsewhere, it was a form of sacrilege akin to the plunder of temples practised by many kings for the treasury. The Rājataranginī has a good deal to say about such practices being resorted to by the kings of Kashmir. Śamkaravarman plundered sixty-four temples of the gods (5. 169). Kalaśa removed the copper image of the Sun called Tāmravāmin, and carried away also the brass statues from the Vihāras (7. 696). The climax came during the reign of Harsa, who, after plundering the treasures of the temples granted by former kings, turned his attention to the images, and appointed an officer called the Prefect for the uprooting of the gods (devotpātana-nāyaka), with the result that images of gods made of gold, silver and other metals rolled in filth in the streets, like faggots of wood (7. 1089 ff.). Another king of Kashmir Kṣemagupta (950-958 A. D.), a contemporary of Somadeva, used the brass from a statue of Buddha in building the shrine of Kṣema-Gaurīśvara, a show of piety comparable to that of Yaśodhara's minister (6. 172-3). Turning elsewhere, we find that towards the end of the twelfth century a prince of Gujarat, Prahlaḍanadeva, the author of Pārthaparakramā Vyāyoga and founder of Palanpur, melted a brass statue of Jina for making a bull for the Acaleśvara temple, and there is a legend that he was stricken with leprosy as a result of the sin, but cured himself by building a monastery and setting up therein Jaina statues and shrines.¹ The references in Yasastilaka would lead one to suppose that the melting down of images to meet financial needs was not unknown in the Deccan in the tenth century, and Somadeva's statements may be taken as a kind of protest against the practice being resorted to by provincial governors.² It may be mentioned in this connection that, elsewhere, during the reign of the Byzantine Emperor Alexius I Comnenus (1081-1118 A. D.), Leo, Bishop of Chalcedon, came to grief for protesting against the melting down of icons 'for purposes of filling the imperial treasury'.³

The spy in his report describes Yaśodhara's minister as a monster of financial corruption (lañcā-luñcā-mācarah 3. 185). Lañcā or lañca is bribery,⁴ while luñcā is extortion; and the phrase is used in the sense of financial corruption in general. Somadeva deals with the subject in his Nītvākyaṃṛta and describes lañcaluñcā as the source of all evils. Financial malpractice represents the seamy side of government, and Somadeva exhorts the king not to allow persons who come on business to become the victims of rapacious officials.⁵

Glances of economic prosperity are occasionally afforded by our work. The description of a prosperous dairy-farm of Karahāta occurring in Book V has been translated in the previous chapter. More interesting is the description of the mart owned and run by the trusted priest Śrībhūti in the story recounted in Yasastilaka, Book VII, section 27. We are told that

1 See Dalal's Introduction to the play in G O S

2 Classical antiquity provides instances of rapacious princes laying sacrilegious hands on costly images. Clement of Alexandria (second century A. D.) reports in his Exhortation to the Greeks (Chap IV) that the tyrant Dionysius the younger stripped the statue of Zeus in Sicily of its golden cloak and ordered it to be clothed with a woolen one, while Antiochus of Cyzicus, a Greek city of Asia Minor, when he was in want of money, ordered the golden statue of Zeus, fifteen cubits high, to be melted down, and a similar statue of cheaper material covered with gold leaf to be set up in its place.

4 Lañca, 'bribe', is used in Pali, being peculiar to the Jātaka literature. See Rhys Davids Pali-English Dictionary Cf Pali lañcakkhādaka, 'bribe-eater'. The Bengali expression ghushkhor means the same thing. Compare also lāca khāne in Marāṭhi and lañca tnnu in Kannada.

The anonymous comm on Nītvākyaṃṛta says लुञ्चलुञ्चानिशाचराणां लुञ्चकशब्देन (लुञ्चशब्देन ?) उत्कोच लुञ्चाशब्देन बलात्कार एत एव निशाचरा राक्षसाः. Farther on it says लुञ्चेन बलात्कारग्रहणेन, also लुञ्चेन कार्यकरणे बलात्कारेण हरणे. There is some confusion of meaning, but the expression as a whole signifies extortion or unlawful exactions by the king or his officials. Somadeva remarks in Nītvākyaṃṛta (op. cit.): राक्षो लुञ्चेन कार्यकरणे ज्ञानं नान् कश्चापि; the mart (penṭhāsthāna) was furnished with tents containing many compartments and large stores of merchandise, with stalls for cattle nearby. Water, fodder and fire-wood were easily available, and the establishment covered an area of about four miles. It was closely guarded by troops, and protected by moats, gates, walls and ramparts, and had avenues with arrangements for water-supply, eating houses, assembly halls, and warehouses for different classes of commodities. Gamblers, whoremongers, jesters and dancing masters were excluded from the precincts of the mart. Here merchants from many countries were allowed to carry on their business, the rates of toll and rent being extremely moderate.¹ The mart maintained by Śrībhūti seems to be entirely a private organisation, but in Nitwākyaṃrta 19. 21 Somadeva speaks of pnthā (sic) as a state organisation, and observes that a mart 'maintained with justice' is a source of endless profits to the king.² The commentary on the latter work explains pnthā as sulkasthāna, and quotes a verse from Śukra to the effect that toll should not be realised at excessive rates, and whatever is stolen by thieves from the mart should be restored to the merchants by the king from his own treasury.³ The pnthā is described in Nitwākyaṃrta as panyaputabhedini, explained in the commentary as containing diverse places for storing commodities,⁴ and it seems to have had an elaborate organisation, to judge from the description in Yasastilaka. The granting of proper facilities and protection to merchants was the chief aim of these emporiums, which were also an important source of revenue to the state.

References to the fine arts are few and far between in our work. An interesting statuary group is presented in the description of the Pavilion of mechanical showers in Book III.⁵ The account of the Jaina temple in Book V is chiefly remarkable for its paintings, of which two categories are mentioned.⁶ Firstly, there are portraits of wellknown figures of Jaina legend and mythology, viz. Bāhubali the warrior saint,⁷ Pradyumna whose austerities are celebrated in Jaina legend,¹ the Tirthamkara Supārśva,² and king Aśokacandra and his consort Rohini, the woman who did not know how to weep.³ Secondly, there are representations of most of the dreams of Rṣabha Jina's mother, e g, the Airāvata elephant, a bull, a lion, the goddess Lakṣmī, the sun and the moon, a lotus-pool, the ocean, flames, a heap of jewels, and an aerial car.⁴ Further, the temple is described as being marked with two fish, like the Mūdṛā of the Pāndyan kings.⁵ The figures of fish were apparently painted on the walls, a pair of fish being included among the eight auspicious objects of the Jainas. It may be noted in this connection that the fish appears also in early Christian art where it 'recalled the name of Jesus, as Christ, Son of God and Saviour'.⁶ As regards the Pāndyan mūdṛā, it might mean seal or coin or perhaps both. We know that "gold coins bearing the emblem universally adopted by the Pāndyas in later times, viz the fish have been attributed to a period from the 7th to the 10th century A. D."⁷ It is extremely probable that Somadeva actually saw Pāndyan coins with the double fish emblem.⁸

In the course of the description of the Jaina temple Somadeva refers to two technical terms of painting rūpaḡunānikā 'the study of figures' and pārśvāgata 'the side view proper', being one of the nine different positions in which the figures may appear.⁹ Viśnudharmottara 39 f (Part III) says, nava sthānāni rūpāṇām.¹⁰

Writing in ink on ivory slabs is mentioned in Book I.¹¹ In Book III Somadeva refers to a gold ring with the figure of Lakṣmī stamped on it.¹ Glass bangles are mentioned in Book IV.² Shopfronts of garland-sellers,³ stalls of dealers in perfumes,⁴ and streets full of courtesans and women messengers⁵ form part of the description of evening scenery at the beginning of Book IV. The gorgeous apartments of the queen are located on the top floor of a seven-storied palace,⁶ and a Jaina shrine is described as being on the top floor of a seven-storied palace belonging to a wealthy merchant in a story in Book VI, section 12. Palaces whence elephant-races were witnessed are mentioned in Books III and VII, section 32.⁷

The prevalence of early marriage is attested both in Yasastilaka and Nitvākyaṃśa. A speaker in a story in the former work (Book VI, section 19) identifies heaven with the mutual love of a maiden, twelve years of age, and a youth of sixteen⁸, while in Nitvākyaṃśa 31.1 it is clearly said that a maiden and a youth of the age specified above are fit for marital relations.⁹

Certain details concerning crime and punishment are preserved in Yasastilaka. In a story in Book VII, section 27, the priest Śrībhūti who is found guilty of breach of trust is given three choices by the king: he must either swallow three bowls of cow-dung or receive thirty-three blows to be given by powerful wrestlers, or forfeit his entire property. When he chooses the latter alternative, all his wealth is confiscated, and he is smeared with clay teeming with worms, and made to wear garlands of potsherds and abandoned platters, and expelled from the city seated on the back of a donkey. Similar treatment is meted out to Paivata by the enraged citizens in a story in Book VII, section 30. He is pelted with clods of earth and severely whipped and turned out of the city on the back of a donkey, clothed in rags from the cremation ground, and wearing a garland of platters, with the head shaven at random with the blade held in the reverse direction, and Bilva fruits suspended from the tuft of hair on the crest of the head. As we have already seen, the envoy of the king of Pañcāla was threatened with humiliation of this nature on account of the hostility of his master to Yaśodhara. In another story in Book VII, section 31, the libertine Kadārapīṅga and his father, the minister Ugrasena, who connived at his adulterous adventure, are exiled by the king after indictment in the presence of all the people¹ Public humiliation of the kind noticed here seems to have been reserved for respectable offenders, and is heard of in the annals of other countries as well. In the eighth century at Rome, for example, the deposed Pope Constantine, after he was blinded, 'was led in derision through the streets seated on a horse with a woman's saddle and heavy weights attached to his feet' Somadeva refers also to the torture of thieves and the indignities heaped upon them. In Yasastilaka, Book V, in the episode of king Sudatta, a thief accused of robbing and murdering a barber is condemned by the judges to 'picturesque imprisonment' (citro bandhak) so that he might lose his life in ten or twelve days, the preliminary indignities to be inflicted on him being riding a donkey, and fastening round the neck a row of cast off earthen vessels²

Certain details about cruelty to animals are recorded in our work. In one of the birth-stories in Book V, a buffalo is tortured to death with revolting cruelty for killing the king's horse, and the incident is described also in Haribhadra's *Samarāṅgacakāḥ*³ We are told that the feet of the animal were tied together, and burning coals heaped upon the body, while salt water was poured over the wounds, and he was allowed to drink water mixed with boiled extracts of peppers. On the other hand, the epitaphs on the dog and the peacock who were accidentally killed, as related in another story⁴ in the same Book, bear testimony to the love of animals. It is interesting to note that a contemporary record, the Ātakūr inscription of the Ganga ruler Būtuga II, who took part in the battle of Takkolam in 949 A D, tells us that Manālara who fought in front of him in the battle made a gift of land in memory of a hound, who had attacked and killed a boar, but was himself killed in the fight⁵

CHAPTER VI

YASASTILAKA AS A RELIGIOUS ROMANCE

As we have already remarked (Chap IV), the Jaina writers of the tenth century and after, who composed prose romances in Sanskrit, introduced into them a religious element which was absent in the works of Dandin, Bāna and Subandhu. Siddharṣi's Upamatiḥhavaprapañcā Kathā and Somadeva's Yasastilaka are two outstanding examples of Jaina religious romance in the tenth century, and it is evident that the development of the religious novel is a comparatively late phenomenon in Sanskrit literary history. In Prākṛit, on the other hand, we have comprehensive Jaina religious romances like Uddyotana's Kuvalayamālā and Haribhadra's Samarāṅgalakā in prose and verse composed in the eighth century, while the extensive Vasudevahindī in prose is ascribed to about the seventh century, and the lost Tarangavati of Pādalypta is much earlier.¹ Such religious romances are called dharmakathā (dharmakathā) in Prākṛit, and Haribhadra, in fact, enumerates four varieties of kathā in the prologue to his Samarāṅgalakā anthakathā, kāmakathā, dharmakathā and the mixed saṃkīrṇakathā. Of these the dharmakathā is declared to be the highest type of narrative, illustrating as it does such qualities as forbearance, kindness, honesty, renunciation, austerities, self-restraint, truthfulness, purity, non-possession, and chastity, and the Anuvratas and the other vows, in fact, the entire code of Jaina ethics and religious discipline. Uddyotana in his Kuvalayamālā mentions four types of dharmakathā. ākṣepinī or pleasant, vikṣepinī or unpleasant, saṃvegayanānī or leading to knowledge, and nirvedayanānī or leading to detachment.² The purpose of the dharmakathā is clear from these definitions, and we may in this connection refer to another division of kathā into cariya and kappiya found in Vasudevahindī, Chap. X, which has a bearing on the character of the dharmakathā. The cariya deals with what is actually seen, heard or experienced in matters relating to dharma, artha and kāma, while the kappiya is a story modified and altered for the purpose of instruction, and narrated in one's own way.³ It is obviously an imaginative tale with a didactic purpose, and may be correlated with a dharmakathā.

Judged by these standards, Yasastilaka is clearly a dharma-kathā. Apart from the fact that it is a comprehensive manual of Jaina moral and religious doctrines, its purpose is to illustrate the great doctrine of ahimsā and its manifold implications. Yasodhara, it will be remembered, had to undergo grievous suffering in several births even for the sin of sacrificing the paste model of a cock with the idea of killing. This aspect of the story brings into relief certain moral and religious issues which throw interesting light on the Jaina view of ahimsā.

In the first place, the practice of sacrificing the effigy of an animal seems to have been an expedient favoured by those who were opposed to animal sacrifices as such, and instances of this are recorded not only in Indian but also Greek literature. It is stated, for example, in Rājataranginī 8.7 that during the reign of Meghavāhana, an ancient king of Kashmir, who prohibited animal slaughter in the kingdom, it was the custom to sacrifice butter models of animals in Vedic rites and those of paste in the Bhūtayajña offerings.¹ In later times Madhvācārya is said to have introduced a reform consisting in the substitution of similar models of rice-flour for live animals in Vedic ritual.² As regards Greek tradition, Philostratus likewise says in the Life of Apollonius of Tyana, the Greek saint and mystic of the first century A. D., that Empedocles of Agragas (in Sicily), made at Olympia a bull out of pastry (pemma porēsamenos) and sacrificed it to the god, showing thereby that he approved of the sentiments of Pythagoras.³ Apollonius himself, who was opposed to animal sacrifices, is said to have condemned blood offerings in the temple at Alexandria, and sacrificed in the fire, by way of contrast, a plasma interpreted as a frankincense model of a bull (V XXV). It is interesting to note that Apollonius refers in this connection to Indian sentiments, perhaps Buddhist or Jain. When the Egyptian priest sneered at his disapproval of animal sacrifices by saying that no one was so clever as to make corrections in the rites of the 3 Book I, chap. I (Loeb Classical Library). Philostratus wrote about 217 A. D. Dio-genēs Laertius VIII 53 records a statement that Empedocles sacrificed a bull made out of honey and barley-meal in honour of the Sacred envoys. It may be noted that the early Egyptian king Amenhetep IV (fourteenth century B. C.) is said to have offered in his temple bloodless sacrifices, chiefly of incense. He suppressed the worship of Amen and of the old gods of Egypt, and led a short-lived religious revolution in favour of the god Aten, which represented a solar monotheism based on the worship of the disc of the sun. Budge, Egypt, p. 146. cf. Erman: Handbook of Egyptian Religion, p. 63 ff. and Breasted Development of Religion and Thought in ancient Egypt, p. 319 ff.

Egyptians, Apollonius is reported to have answered "Anyone with a little wisdom, if only he comes from India" Be that as it may, the story of Yaśodhara makes it clear that so far as Jainism was concerned, it was opposed even to the sacrifice of lifeless models of animals, it rejected the very idea of animal sacrifices

In the second place, the story of Yaśodhara is designed also to show that the resulting consequences might be quite out of proportion to the sin committed by an individual. The latter point is emphasized by Haribhadra in his version of the story¹ He makes Yaśodhara declare that even a slight error is fraught with peril, as can be seen from the dire results produced even by the sacrifice of a cock made out of paste²

Somadeva considers the problem of ahimsā in its relation to abhinivesa, the decisive character of which is stressed in a notable discourse in Book IV It is put in the mouth of Yaśodhara, who accepts a compromise on the subject of animal sacrifice, and agrees to sacrifice an artificial cock to Candikā with the object of attaining the results obtainable by sacrificing living creatures.³ The idea of killing is thus present, although a lifeless model is substituted for a real cock Somadeva emphasizes in this connection the importance of abhinivesa, 'mental preoccupation or resolve', 'purpose or motive', or 'intention', and declares that "the wise speak of abhinivesa as occupying the paramount place in all actions leading to virtue or sin. The external sense-organs, like the rays of the sun, are drawn equally to good as well as bad objects, but that alone does not make the agent liable to virtue or sin"⁴ This is another way of saying that it is the intention and not the outward act which determines the moral validity of an action The idea is implied in another statement which Somadeva makes elsewhere, that if a person, pure in thought and action, inflicts injury on any one, he cannot be regarded as having done any injury at all.⁵ Somadeva illustrates the point further, using in this connection the term abhidhyāna in place of abhinivesa A fisherman, for example, although he does not actually kill the fish, is a sinner because his motive is himsā, while a cultivator who happens to kill various creatures while tilling the ground incurs no sin, because he has no deleterious motive ¹

Somadeva uses also the terms samkalpa and abhisamdhī in the same sense as abhinvesa. Abhisamdhī is often used in this sense elsewhere, for example, in the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya on the Vaiśeṣika Sūtras ² With regard to samkalpa, Somadeva says that the profanation of stones invested with divinity and set up with the samkalpa or intention of worshipping them is (in the Jaina view) a grievous sin ³ Similarly, it is the samkalpa which makes a householder an ascetic, and an ascetic a householder. ⁴ The householder Arhaddāsa continued his religious meditation even on hearing of the death of his wife and children, while the sage Puruhūta, formerly a king, although engaged in austerities, formed a warlike resolution as soon as he heard that his son was being attacked by enemies. ⁵ The respective samkalpas of Arhaddāsa and Puruhūta thus determined their moral outlook, regardless of their outward vocations. Somadeva lays emphasis also on the difficulty of purifying the mind once it is polluted by an evil intention, and says that the sum total of pious acts done over a long period is completely destroyed in a moment, like a house on fire, if marred by an evil intention even once through error ⁶ Further, the bearing and conduct of different persons towards the same object are bound to vary according to the diversity of their intentions or mental attitude. A sage, a libertine and a vulture do not, for example, have the same attitude towards the body of a young woman. ⁷

Somadeva points out that mental activity is the main spring of virtue and sin:

तरेषु संकल्पवशेन मन्मथो यथा प्रवर्तते पथश्च धेनुषु । तथैव कर्माण्युभयानि मानसादधाति बोधाधिपतिर्विजृम्भितात् ॥

of mental activity the Self acquires karma, good and bad (Book IV, p. 137). Thus, according to Somadeva, mental activity represented by abhinivesa or samkalpa involves a process which gives rise to the physical act and determines its moral validity. And ahimsā is not merely abstention from killing, but presupposes the absence of the very idea of killing, the complete absence of any samkalpa that might have the remotest connection with injury to living creatures.

The insistence on ahimsā brought Jainism into conflict with diverse cults, and Yasastilaka preserves a faithful record of the religious conflict of the times. Somadeva's romance is a notable protest not only against the Vedic sacrificial system but against the debased form of contemporary Kaula or Tantric cults involving human sacrifice, and contains also important data on the historic conflict between Śaivism and Jainism in the South. These topics have been dealt with in subsequent chapters, and we may here confine our remarks to the protest against Tantric and Vedic rites. It may be noted that such protests occur also in Jaina works outside Sanskrit literature, for example, in the poem Neelakesi, one of the early Tamil classics,¹ which describes how the Jaina ascetic Muncandra puts a stop to blood offerings to Kālī, and foils the designs of the goddess and her chief Neelakesī, who is ultimately converted to Jainism, and preaches the doctrine of ahimsā. The Neelakesi is also a controversial work, like Somadeva's Yasastilaka, directed against Buddhism and other systems, one chapter being devoted to the criticism of Vedavāda involving animal sacrifices.

It will be remembered that Yasastilaka opens with the Māradata episode which shows the Tantric cult in the darkest colours, and there is hardly any parallel to Somadeva's graphic description of the temple of Candamārī and its horrid atmosphere in the whole range of Sanskrit literature.² The human victims are brought to the temple, but not actually sacrificed, and this gives the author an opportunity of demonstrating the salutary influence of Jainism, which undoubtedly did good work by raising its voice against blood-thirsty cults like those of Candamārī or Candikā.³ A somewhat similar episode occurs in Haribhadra's Samarāṅgacakāhā (Book VI) in the story of Dharana, who is brought by the Śābaras to the temple of Kadambārī or Candikā as an offering, but is not actually immolated,

2 See Chap II.

3 Compare the early Christian protest against human sacrifices, e. g. in Clement's Exhortation to the Greeks (second century). In that work he records a number of Pagan cults involving human sacrifice, and remarks that such sacrifice is murder and human butchery.

and the Śabara chief Kālasena partially at least accepts the principle of ahimsā, and agrees to worship the idol with flowers and perfumes instead of blood offerings. In our work Māradatta and his subjects are, of course, converted to Jainism at the end, and the conversion motif is an appropriate feature of a religious romance, and found, for example, in early Christian novels like Xanthippe and Polyxena attributed to about the fourth century,¹ and St John Damascene's Barlaam and Ioasaph etc. Perhaps more striking is the calm and fearless attitude of the two young votaries of Jainism, who are brought to the temple of Candamāī as sacrificial victims. Their courage, equanimity and dignified bearing do credit to the faith; and it is they who give utterance to the great idea of returning good for evil.² As we have pointed out elsewhere (chap I), the idea is common in Buddhist literature, and inherent in the doctrine of the Four Actions,³ but it no doubt represents one of the noblest teachings of Jainism as well. The utter resignation of the young ascetics and their readiness for suffering and disregard of death, as expressed in their own utterances, clearly illustrate some of the best moral influences of the doctrine of the Arhat. For example,

सोदस्त्वत्प्रणयादनेन मनसा तदु खदावानल ससाराब्धिनिमज्जनादपि कृत किञ्चित्त्वदानन्दनम् ।

स्वत्कीडागमकारणोचितमतेस्त्वक्त. श्रिय संगमो यद्यद्यापि विधे न तुष्यसि तदा तत्रापि सज्जा वयम् ॥

'Thou Fate, thanks to thy favour, this heart hath endured the intense fire of all that suffering (in previous lives). Thou hast even been gratified a little by our plunging into the ocean of worldly existence. Prosperity, apt to be the cause of thy sports, hath been discarded by us. If thou art not pleased even now, ready we are for suffering evermore' (1 132). The ascetic boy likewise says to his companion at the sight of the terrible goddess and the king and the crowd in her temple

विशुद्धबोधं तप एव रक्षा ग्रामेस्वरण्येषु च संयतानाम् ।

अत कृतान्तेऽपि समीपवृत्तौ मातर्मनो मा स कथा निरीशम् ॥

possesses the Jewel of Right Faith, and is endowed with Right Conduct, and devoted to holy meditation.' (1 139-40)

Without disparaging Somadeva's picture of the fortitude and equanimity of the young Jaina munis, we may here refer to the remarkable story of the young Buddhist novice Adhimutta in the Theragāthā (705 ff), which depicts his dauntless courage and philosophic calm when he is seized by highwaymen as a suitable offering to their deity, apparently of the same type as the Candamāī figuring in our romance. Adhimutta declares, for example,

This body irketh me, no seeker I
To live This mortal frame will broken be,
And ne'er another from it be reborn
Your business with my body, come, that do
E'en as ye will, and not on that account
Will hatred or affection rise in me ¹

The attack on Vedic and Smārta rites involving animal sacrifices occurs chiefly in the controversial dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother, analysed elsewhere ² The Jaina condemnation of animal sacrifices is similar to that of the Buddhists, and reminds one of the attacks on Pagan sacrifices found in the writings of the Christian apologists of the second century such as Justin, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Tatian, and Arnobius (end of the third century) and others. ³ Arnobius, for example, says: "Lastly, what pleasure is it to take delight in the slaughter of harmless creatures, . . . to see rivers of blood, the life fleeing away with the blood . . .? Will any one believe that the gods, who are kind, beneficent and gentle, are delighted and filled with joy by the slaughter of cattle, if ever they fall and expire pitiably before their altars?" ⁴ Similar sentiments are found in Yasastilaka, Book IV and other anti-Brahmanical writings ⁵ Arnobius goes on to say. ".....is that foul smell, then, which is given forth and emitted by burning hides, by bones, by bristles, . . . (is that) a favour and an honour to the deity?" This sounds like Somadeva's line (Book IV, p. 109)

Similarly, the sarcastic veise, attributed in our work to an ox addressing a priest about to sacrifice him, in the story related by Yaśodhara in the dialogue with his mother,¹ has its counterpart in Arnobius VII 9 in the elaborate speech imagined to be addressed to Jupiter by an ox on the iniquity of sacrificing him to appease the fury of the gods. But the Jaina view of ahimsā is far more comprehensive than the Christian objection to animal sacrifices, involving as it does complete abstinence from all kinds of flesh food. Arnobius, in fact, deeply regrets the necessity that compels men to kill animals for food, and we have what we may call his confession on the subject: "We half-savage men, nay rather . . . , we savages, whom unhappy necessity and bad habit have trained to take these as food, are sometimes moved with pity for them..... . . ."²

The condemnation of animal food and blood-shedding sacrifices is an important adjunct of the Jaina doctrine of ahimsā, and Somadeva's Yasastilaka contains many interesting data on this aspect of Jainism. Buddhism was equally opposed to sacrifices, but the Jaina prohibition of animal food is far stricter than that of the Buddhists, and Somadeva, in fact, severely criticizes the latter for eating flesh³, and similar criticism occurs also in the Tamil Jaina poem Neelakesi.⁴ It is noteworthy that it is in certain early Greek⁵ and Jewish and Jewish-Christian⁶ sects

5 The early Pythagoreans do not seem to have been strict in abstinence from animal flesh. It is said that Pythagoras himself did not abstain from animal flesh in general, but only from that of the ploughing ox and the ram, although he is said to have refused to sacrifice on any but the oldest altar, that of Apollo the Father, where only bloodless sacrifices were allowed. It was the later Pythagoreans (fourth century B C), called also Akousmatics, who practised vegetarianism and complete abstinence from meat, fish, wine etc, and did not participate in the usual sacrifices. Diogenes Laertius, Book VIII, Burnet Early Greek Philosophy, p 93, Zeller Outlines of the History of Greek Philosophy, p 72. Still later, the Pythagorean rule of life embodying these principles was again preached by Apollonius of Tyana, as stated above. Empedocles of Akragas (fifth century B C), who as a religious teacher was guided by Pythagorean influence, also advocated abstinence from animal food and blood-offerings, which, as we have seen, were replaced by sacrificial cakes in animal form. Burnet (op cit), p 250, Zeller, p 58.

6 The Essenes were a pre-Christian Jewish sect of Syria and Palestine, and followed, according to the historian Josephus, the Pythagorean mode of life, a significant phrase. Moore Judaism, Vol I, p 457. They were communists, and the initiate, before he was allowed to share the common meal, was required to take an oath, among other things, "never to injure anyone, either of his own accord or under compulsion". The Essenes included the Therapeutae, who were to be found in Egypt, and schools that we find a close parallel to the Jaina prohibition of animal food and sacrifices, and special reference may be made in this connection to the Pythagorean rule of life preached by Apollonius of Tyana in the first century A D, as recorded in the biography of the saint by Philostratus (VI XI, VIII, VII etc)

The dialogue between Yasodhara and his mother in Yasastilaka, Book IV, is highly interesting from the standpoint of comparative religion. In the first place, the attack on the Brahmanical deities, found also elsewhere in the work as well as in other Jaina texts, is comparable to the attack on the pagan deities found even in a more systematic form in early Christian apologetic literature, e g, in Clement's Exhortation to the Greeks, The Seven Books of Arnobius Adversus Gentes etc In the second place, it is noteworthy that in the dialogue in question Yasodhara takes pains to prove the antiquity of Jainism in order to refute the charge that it is a modern creed, and cites in support of his thesis evidence that is not altogether convincing and reliable¹ The anxiety of a minority faith to establish its ancient origin by all kinds of literary evidence at its disposal for the purpose of enhancing its prestige is inevitable in its struggle for recognition, and instances of this are found also in the literature of Christianity in the early period of its conflict with the Pagan cults For example, Tertullian, who admits that the Christian community is rather modern, points out that it rests on the very ancient books of the Jews, and asserts that Moses is earlier than Danaus, "Your most ancient of men", about a thousand years ahead of the Trojan and led the contemplative life of ascetics, their so-called feasts where no flesh was served 'were famous and formed a contrast to Greek revels' Encyclopedia Britannica, sub voce, fourteenth edition Next in importance for our purpose is the Jewish-Christian sect of the Ebionites (second century), or, strictly speaking, that section of the Ebionites who derived their tenets from contact with the Essenes and the Gnostics, and professed what is known as Essene or Gnostic Ebionism These Ebionites denied the divinity of Jesus, and their discipline included abstinence from flesh and prohibition of bloodshedding sacrifices the Pentateuch, specially where it requires sacrifice and the use of flesh, was to be rejected Gnosticism has been described as a system of heathenish thought, adopting some Jewish and some Christian elements, and we are here concerned with the Syrian school whose inspiration was Oriental, and practice ascetic Saturnilus, or Saturninus, of Antioch and Tatian of Mesopotamia belong to the Syrian school (second century A D) Both of them condemned marriage and animal food, while the asceticism of Tatian was so thorough that his followers were called Encratites, or professors of an abstinence that was really total Kidd A History of the Church, vol I, chapters IV and VIII On the Essenes cf Headlam The Life and teaching of Jesus the Christ, pp 110, 137, 162, fourth edition, 1940, Peters The Religion of the Hebrews, p 423.

See Chap. XIII.

war, and fifteen hundred years before Homer. As regards proofs, the task of setting them out in detail is "not difficult so much as endless, not an arduous task, but for the moment too long"¹. To the same category of presumptions belong Pontius Pilate's alleged report to Tiberius on the story of the resurrection of Christ², and spurious documents such as the letter of Marcus Aurelius to the Senate on the miraculous effect of the prayers of his Christian soldiers on the great drought in Germany, Abgar's letter to Christ and his reply thereto etc.³ So far as Somadeva is concerned, he cannot indeed be accused of forgery, but only of misjudging the chronological value of some of the authorities cited by him.

It will also be seen that, in Yasodhara's dialogue with his mother Candramati, he makes a serious attempt to refute the charges levelled against Jainism by her, and elsewhere in the work Somadeva justifies certain typical beliefs and practices of the Jaina faith⁴. It is, as a matter of fact, one of the objects of Yasastilaka to remove misconceptions and prejudices concerning the religion of the Aihav, and establish its legitimate place among the recognised schools and systems of the land. In this respect also Somadeva's work reminds one of the literary efforts of the early Christian apologists, and we may besides refer in this connection to a work like Against Apion of the Jewish historian Josephus (first century A. D.), who sets out not only to demonstrate the great antiquity of the Jewish people and explain and eulogize their law but to rebut certain calumnies of the Greek writers on the subject⁵. The occasional similarities between Jaina and Christian polemical literature are not surprising, and may be attributed to a like cause, the religious conflicts of the Graeco-Roman world and of Ancient and Medieval India⁶. Apologetic literature is, however, apt to lose part of its interest after the storm and stress of controversy is over, and what has been said of the work of Josephus may also be applied to Somadeva's apology for Jainism in his romance. No one today doubts the antiquity of Jainism or considers the Digambaras to be unworthy people, but the defence of Jainism in the dialogue in Yasastilaka, Book IV, although a record of past prejudices, is important as reflecting contemporary conditions, and preserving for us a number of citations from works no longer extant and certain important references to little known authors.

The controversial dialogue is indeed a conspicuous feature of Yasastilaka as a religious romance. In addition to the dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother in Book IV, the episode of Candakarma in Book V contains a dialogue in which a follower of the Sāṃkhya system, a Mimāṃsaka, a Cārvāka, a Śaiva and a Buddhist expound their respective tenets before the Jaina teacher Sudatta, who makes a summary reply, reserving for special attack the doctrines of the Śaivas¹. Very unlike is the dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother, which is a lively debate on questions at issue between Jainism and the Brahmanical religion. It is an interesting fact that, whenever there is a conflict of religions, the controversial dialogue or religious debate tends to appear in contemporary literature. In Jaina literature itself there are examples which might have served as models for later writers like Somadeva. For instance, in the Sūtrakṛtāṅga Sūtra II 6 there is an important dialogue, in which Ādraka, a follower of Mahāvīra, is the chief speaker, and refutes the views of the representatives of various schools: Gośāla, a Buddhist, a Vedāntin, a Vedic priest, and a Hastitāpasa². Turning to Western literature, we may refer to such examples as the famous Octavius of Minucius Felix (circa 180 A.D.), which records a debate in Latin between two friends on the relative merits of Pagan and Christian beliefs, Justin's Dialogue with the Jew Trypho (2nd century) in Greek, and Aristo's lost Dialogue between the Christian Jason and the Jew Papiscus, also in Greek,³ and composed about the same time. Amicable debates between exponents of Christianity and Islam are known to have been encouraged by certain Califs and Byzantine Emperors,⁴ while the Emperor Manuel Palaeologus (1391-1425 A.D.) wrote a large number of polemical dialogues directed against Islam.⁵ More interesting from our point of view is the debate on the validity and merits of Pagan beliefs and the Christian religion occurring in St John Damascene's Barlaam and Ioasaph, a Greek religious novel of about the eighth century.

A. D.¹ The discussion here is not in the form of a dialogue, but we have the speech of Nachor against the Pagan deities and in praise of the Christians, and the contest, as recorded in the work, provides, on the whole, a good example of a religious debate incorporated in a prose romance (Chap. XXVI ff). Authorities are not cited as in Yasastilaka, but the speech of Nachor itself is nothing but the Apology of Aristides, a philosopher of Athens of the second century A. D., 'fitted, with some deftness into its new context' In the Jaina romance mother and son disagree on religious issues, while in the Greek story the disagreement is between father and son; but while in Yasastilaka the disputants themselves carry on the debate, in Barlaam and Ioasaph orators are employed by both parties to plead their cause Religion plays an important part in another medieval Greek romance of the tenth century, the Byzantine poem of Digenis Akritas, wherein Emir Mousour, a Muhammadan convert to Christianity, soon after his baptism enters into a discussion with his mother to make her renounce the religion of Islam, and argues like a veritable theologian.² Somadeva's Yasastilaka is likewise a religious romance composed in an age of conflict, and as such shares some of the characteristics of works written at similar epochs

The stories of rebirth in Book V are a typically Jaina feature, and similar stories are found in earlier romances like Vasudevahindī, Samarāñcakahā etc; they are not without interest from the standpoint of comparative literature.³ The sequence of Karma and rebirth, which

3 As is well known, Pythagoras and Empedocles taught the doctrine of Rebirth or transmigration, which the former may have learnt from the contemporary Orphics, For possible Indian influence on Pythagoras see Gomperz Greek Thinkers, vol I, p 127 Empedocles says that he has not only been a human being, a boy and a maid, and a plant, but even a fish Diogenes Laertius, VIII. 77 The Greek writer Lucian of Samosata (second century A. D.), in his pleasant satire The Dream, or The Cock, describes the bird as declaring to his master Micyllus the cobbler that, before being a cock, he was first Euphorbus who fought at Troy, then Pythagoras, then the courtesan Aspasia, then the Cynic Crates, after that, a king, then a poor man, and soon a satrap, then a horse, a jackdaw, a frog, and a thousand things besides the cobbler admits that he can no longer call himself the master of such a bird Traces of belief in metempsychosis are found in old Irish sagas (seventh century A. D. and earlier). For example, Tuan, son of Carrell, had been successively a man, a stag, a boar, a falcon, a salmon, and then again a man Dottin L'Épopée Irlandaise, p 9 The peculiarity of the Jaina stories is that each successive birth of an individual is narrated in detail so as to form a regular sequence designed to illustrate the vicissitudes brought about by the law of Karma The period of development of these stories may be taken to be the same as these stories illustrate, is also emphasized elsewhere in the romance, being represented as the raison d'être of Dharma and the antidote against materialism.

“Dharma need not, of course, be practised if the existence of the Self were limited to the period between birth and death. But that is not the case. Because, do we not see in the world people who can remember their past lives as well as those who become ghosts after death? If self-done Karma had no effect on sentient beings, would all creatures not be equal in status? It is also false to say that the mind is composed of matter, because mind and matter essentially differ, like earth and air. On these grounds the following statement turns out to be true. The science of astrology¹ reveals the consequences of good and bad Karma accumulated in another birth, just as a lamp reveals things in darkness” (Book IV, p. 92)

The romance of Yaśodhara has also a didactic purpose. It shows us the seamy side of a woman's character and warns against the grave consequences of conjugal infidelity. The idea that marriage entitles the husband to the body of a woman, ‘sold by her parents in the presence of the gods, the Brāhmanas, and the Fire’² but not necessarily to her heart, occurs twice in our work, in Book IV, and in the story of Padmā in Book VII. We read in the latter context that of the Jaina Kathānaka literature. See Chap. XVI. It may be added that the doctrine of metempsychosis appears also in the system of the Elkasaites, a Jewish-Christian sect of the second century ‘for, though Christ was regarded as born in the ordinary way, His birth of Mary was held to be but one of many such experiences. He had been incarnate before and would be incarnate again’ Kidd (op. cit.), vol. I, p. 103. The literary history of metempsychosis is a subject which requires detailed treatment on comparative lines.

स्त्रीणां वपुर्वन्धुभिरग्निसाक्षिकं परत्र विक्रीतमिदं न मानसम् ।

1 Śrutasāgara says in his commentary that the verse is written at the beginning of horoscopes. The evidence of astrology is cited to prove the existence of Karma and rebirth.

2 See Chap. III.

‘The body of a woman and not her heart is sold to another by her relations with Fire for witness But he alone is the lucky lord of her heart, in whom she verily finds joy and bliss born of confidence’ (p 363)

These ideas favourable to free love seem to have been current in Somadeva’s time, and it is his purpose in Yasastilaka to show that they cannot be put forward as an excuse for treachery much less for crime

We have discussed elsewhere Somadeva’s attitude towards women, and as is to be expected in a thinker like him, it takes into account diverse aspects of female character (Chap V) There are, however, certain attacks on women, for example, those in Book I, attributed to the sage Sudatta, which may fittingly occur in a religious romance, particularly in one dealing with a Jaina theme Similar attacks are also found, for example, in the Buddhist biographical romance Lalitavistara (Chap 15) Disgust for women is only a form of that detachment and indifference to worldly pleasures which it is the purpose of a Jaina dharmakathā to inculcate. This is the moral and religious background of Sudatta’s reflections on the decomposed body of a young woman in the cremation ground (1 95–124), particular emphasis being laid on the contrast between the courtesan’s once admired beauty and the miserable condition of her corpse¹ The musings of the Jaina monk belong to the same category as the Buddhist asubha-bhāvanā, the meditation on impurity, on the horrors of bodily disease, decay and corruption. The dead body of a young woman is a familiar object for such contemplation, and an early example of this is found in a psalm attributed to the Thera Rājadatta in the Theragāthā (315 ff.), which describes the monk’s effort to meditate on the partially intact corpse of a courtesan slain and cast into the charnel-field² It may also be noted that observation and contemplation of corpses in various stages of decomposition, and the realisation that one’s own body is of like nature, form part of the discipline envisaged by the introspective process of satipatṭhāna, described in the Dighanikāya XXII. 7 ff. and other Buddhist texts. Meditation of this type is known as pratyūha or pratipaksa-bhāvanā, ‘meditation counteracting attachment to worldly objects’, in Brahmanical literature. Jayanta, discussing the subject in Nyāyamañjarī (Chap. 9), explains how

Sudatta's verses on the corpse of the young woman in Yasastilaka, Book I, may be called a poetic elaboration of a similar idea, and constitute an eloquent sermon on the emptiness of life ¹

An idea of the place occupied by religious topics in Yasastilaka may be had from the fact that, of its eight Books, the last three exclusively deal with Jaina doctrines, the comprehensive controversial dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother occurs in Book IV, and Sudatta's dialogue with Candakarman and his companions containing the criticism of Śaiva doctrines in Book V, while the cult of Candamārī and the Jaina reaction to it are delineated in Book I. Only Book II and the lengthy Book III may be said to be free from religious topics as such.

1 Scenes from the burning ground, 'the vultures and their mates in flocks' and 'the skulls of the dead', are used to illustrate the essential vileness of the human frame in the Nāladhyāra (Chap. V), one of the early Tamil classics, and believed to be of Jaina origin. Pope's translation, p. 29. He remarks that there is no chapter corresponding to this in the Kurral, but the same spirit is recognised in the Tamil Jaina epic Jīvakaśantāman XIII 162-201, 'very striking verses'. "Everything that can be said in disparagement of the 'body of humiliation' is heaped up there. This is a characteristic of Jaina works. In Śaiva books the standpoint is somewhat different." A foundation is laid in this and the preceding chapters for the doctrine of Renunciation, which is defined as 'the relinquishment of all attachment to worldly wealth without, and to the body within (the lusts of the flesh) in view of their impermanency.' pp. 30, 35

CHAPTER VII

YASASTILAKA AS AN ANTHOLOGY OF SANSKRIT VERSE

The large number of verses interspersed in Yasastilaka makes it a veritable anthology of Kāvya poetry¹ in the tenth century. There are groups of verses on diverse topics as well as individual ślokas, which can be detached from the context without causing any appreciable break in the narrative, and form, so to speak, an independent body of verse valuable for the study of the poetry of the period. These verses, as a rule, are composed in a comparatively easy style more attractive than the intricate prose, in which Somadeva chose to recount his story.

I COURT POETRY

A number of verse-groups forming part of the autobiographical record of Yaśodhara deals with aspects of mediæval court life, with which the romance is so closely bound up, and often gives vivid pictures of scenes which Somadeva must have personally witnessed. The cultural value of these verses can hardly be overestimated, and the following specimens form a more or less consecutive series.

α) BIRTH OF YAŚODHARA

The festivities and the atmosphere of gaiety at the royal palace at Ujjayinī on the occasion of the birth of Yaśodhara are described in a dozen verses (2. 68-79)

नृत्यद्वद्धपुरन्निगोयसुभगा सोल्लासहल्लानना. खेळद्वासनकामिनीप्रियभुव. सानन्दधत्रीकुला ।

पिष्टापीडविडम्ब्यमानजरतीसीमन्तकान्ताङ्गणास्तूरोद्यावरवैः सम किल बभु शुद्धान्तमध्यास्तदा ॥

At that hour the inner apartments, delightful with the songs of the old matrons dancing therein, rang with the festive notes of musical instruments, and the countenance of the attendants beamed with joy. The floor presented an amusing scene, dwarfish women indulging in sports. Groups of delighted nurses were about, and the forecourts were charming with the presence of old dames, their hair heavily laden with heaps of coloured powder (2. 68)

आनन्दवाद्यरवपूरितदिङ्मुखानि पौराङ्गनाजनविनोदमनोहराणि ।

आमुक्तकेतुरचितोत्सवतोरणानि कामं तदा शुशुभिरे नगरे गृहाणि ॥

At that time the mansions in the city brightly shone, with flags flying and decorative arches built for the occasion. Charming they were with the pleasantry of the women of the city, and filled the quarters with the gay notes of music (2 75)

At one place the bards, asking for various gifts, praised the king (Yasodgha) in joy "Thou art chief among those who possess sons like India. Thou dost delight in the amorous play of women's lotus eyes. Mayst thou rejoice in the birth of thy son, a mighty festival, the source of a world-purifying halo of fame! The tree of virtue has put forth leaves, riches have blossomed forth, and desire is crowned with success. Thy dynasty, o king, now attains a radiant glory beyond all words The divine Earth has her crowning desire fulfilled And, sire, the joy of thy ministers occasioned by the birth of thy child, knows no bounds, for it has deepened the affection of their hearts" At one place the chamberlains were hurrying to and fro, overjoyed at the gifts presented by their friends. Elsewhere the family priest, desiring wealth, recited blessings "May the queen share for years the prosperity of her consort in company with her sons and grandsons! Just as heaven is delighted with the Kalpa trees, the ocean with the moon, and the nether regions with the lord of the serpents, similarly, may the king, with his fame spreading far and wide, long enjoy days of happiness on account of the joyous birth of this child! May the queen, too, be likewise happy, great in her renown, just as the earth is happy with the great mountain-ranges, the sky with the sun, and the bosom of the earth with its jewels!" (2. 76-79).

b) WEDDING AND CORONATION OF YASODHARA

The wedding and coronation of Yasodhara give occasion to a series of verses recited by the court poets A bard named Jalakehvilāsa announces the preliminary ceremonial bath (2 202-13)

यत्राभूदसृतातपः सुरकरी कल्पद्रुमः कौस्तुभो लक्ष्मीरप्सरसां गणश्च सुधया सार्धं बुधानां मुदे ।

यद्भूयो भुवनोपकारिचरितैरासेन्यमान वनेस्तद्रत्नाकरवारी मञ्जनविधौ भूयात्तत्र श्रेयसे ॥

यज्ञाकलोकमुलिमानसकल्मषाणां कार्दयं करोति सकृदेव कृताभिषेकम् ।

प्राग्बन्धैकस्मिन्नभ्रमतापसानां सेन्य च यत्तत्र तदम्बु मुदेऽस्तु गाङ्गम् ॥

"In the ceremony of thy bath, may the waters of the ocean bring good to thee, the waters whence emerged the moon and the Airāvata elephant and the Kalpa tree and the Kaustubha gem and the goddess of wealth, and the nymphs along with nectar for the pleasure of the gods! The clouds, benefactors of the world, frequent those waters again and again (2 210) May the waters of the Ganges bring thee joy! Even a single dip in them destroys the mental impurities of the sages living in the celestial world Those are the waters resorted to by the anchorites living in the hermitages on the Himalayan peaks " (2 211)

यमुनानर्मदागोदाचन्द्रभागासरस्वती- । सरयू सिन्धुशोणोत्थैर्जलैर्देवोऽभिषिच्यताम् ॥

"Let the king be bathed with the water brought from the Yamunā, the Narmadā, the Godāvarī, the Candrabhāgā, the Sarasvatī, the Śarayū, the Indus and the Śona!" (2. 213)

The ceremonial bath is described in the following verse spoken by Yaśodhara

उल्लोलकवीचिभिर्विचलितापाङ्गोत्पलश्रेणिभिः प्रक्षुब्धकुचचक्रवाकमिथुनैर्व्यालोलनाभीद्वदैः ।

वारस्त्रीलिवहैः सत्यंलिनद जाताभिषेकोत्सव कामं स्फारितकञ्चिदेशपुलिनैः सिन्धुप्रवाहैरिव ॥

'The gay ceremony of my bath was performed by bevvies of court-esans resembling river-streams, to the sound of music The curls of their hair waved like ripples, the corners of the eyes moved like blue lotus beds, the bosoms heaved like pairs of red geese, the navels were agitated like pools of water, and the hips expanded freely like a river's sandy bank ' (2. 214).

The sacred bath is followed by the nuptial rites, and a bard named Manojakuñjara addresses felicitations to Yaśodhara and his bride Amṛtamati (2. 215-220) There is almost an ironic touch in these verses in view of the tragic sequel to the marriage, which at the moment augured so well for the future.

लक्ष्मीरिय त्वमपि माधव एव साक्षादेषा शची सुरपतिस्त्वमपि प्रतीतः ।

आशास्यते तदिह किं भवतोरिदानीं प्रीति पर रतिमनोभवयोरिवास्तु ॥

एषा हिमाञ्चुमणिनिर्मितदेहयष्टिस्त्वं चन्द्रचूर्णरचितावयवश्च साक्षात् ।

एवं न चेत् कथमियं तव संगमेन प्रलङ्गलिर्गतजला सुतनुश्चकस्ति ॥

"She is the goddess of wealth and thou art Visnu himself, she is Śacī and thou art the illustrious Indra What blessings can now be given to you twam? Yet may mutual love be yours like that of Cupid and Rati! Her frame is verily made of moonstones, and thy limbs seem to be composed of particles of moonbeams Otherwise how is it that the fair maiden shines in thy company, perspiring all over the body." (2 215-216)¹.

1 Moonstones are supposed to emit moisture when exposed to the light of the moon.

The bard then adopts an impersonal tone and describes the deportment of a newly married bride, an erotic picture often met with in Kāvya literature.

उक्ता वक्ति न किंचिदुत्तरमिय नालोकितालोक्ते शय्याया विहितागमा च विवशश्चासोत्थणं वेपते ।
नर्मालापविधौ सकोपहृदया गन्तुं पुनर्वाञ्छति प्रीति कस्य तथापि नो वितनुते बाला नवे संगमे ॥
किंचित् केकरवीक्षित किमपि च भ्रूभङ्गलीलायितं किञ्चिन्मन्मनभाषितं किमपि च श्लेषाभिलाषेहितम् ।
इत्थ मुग्धतया बहिर्विलसित वध्वा नवे संगमे चित्तस्थेन मनोभुवा बलवता नीवीखलत्व कृतम् ॥

"When spoken to, she never replies, when looked at, she never glances. Coming to the bed, she trembles heavily, being out of breath. Offended by jesting, she desires to depart. Yet who is not charmed by a maiden in the first union with her? A slight side-glance, a gentle play of the eyebrows, a few indistinct words, and a faint desire and effort to embrace. Such is the deportment born of simplicity, manifested by a bride in her first union with her lover, while the powerful Cupid, abiding in her heart, plays the villain with the knot of her skirt!" (2 218-219)

Then follow the coronation verses recited by the bards while the prince accepts the emblems of sovereignty

अपहसितपुष्पदन्त कुवलयकमलावबोधनादेव । अधरितसकलमहीधरमाभाति तवातपत्रमिदमेकम् ॥

"Sire, here shines the unique parasol. It hath brought under its shade all kings, and surpasses in grandeur the sun and the moon, for it illumines the earth and calls into activity the goddess of wealth" (2 222)

द्विषद्विषमदध्वसाद्भूतां शिरसि स्थित । आरोहतां क्षितीशानां सिंह सिंहासन नृप. ॥

"Let the prince ascend the throne. A lion among kings, he is above all rulers of the earth, having destroyed the pride of his enemies, elephants as it were" (2. 223)

मृगमदतिलकेऽस्मिन्नर्धचन्द्रावदाते जलनिधिरसनोर्वाभाजनैश्वर्यवयं ।

जनितसकललोकानल्पकल्पप्रमोदः क्षितिर्मण ललाटे पट्टबन्धस्तवास्तु ॥²

- 1 Kuvalaya 'the earth' means also 'night lotus' which cannot be opened by the sun, and Kamalā 'the goddess of wealth' has to be construed also as Kamala 'day lotus' which cannot be opened by the moon
- 2 Helen Johnson points out in ABORI, Vol. XXVII, p 187, that there is a reference to pattabandha in Hemacandra's Trisastisalakāpurusa-carita 10 11. In an account of the feud between Pradyota of Avanti and Udayana of Vitabhaya he describes the capture of Pradyota by Udayana who branded Pradyota's forehead with an insulting term. Subsequently they were reconciled and "Udayana made a pattabandha which concealed the brand on Pradyota's forehead. From that time a pattabandha indicated the majesty of kings. Formerly they wore a krīṭa and nothing else as a head-ornament." Hemacandra thus meant by pattabandha a 'fillet', 'diadem', worn around the forehead in contrast with a head-dress worn higher on the head.

"Sire, let the diadem be placed round thy forehead, causing delight to all the world for countless ages Adorned with an ornamental mark of musk-paint, thy brow is bright as the half-moon, shining with the glory of sovereignty over the sea-girt earth!" (2. 224) खड्गश्च तवायम्

"And, this thy sword is verily the light of the moon, causing the bloom of the night lotus-bed, to wit, the joyous advent of prosperity. It is verily the light of the sun, causing the bloom of the day lotus-bed, to wit, the sport of war It is verily the loud laugh of Śiva, reducing the pride of the demons, namely, thy enemies It is verily the smile of Lady Fame, caused by the joy of her prosperous career through the world " (2. 226)

After the coronation, Yasodhara is greeted by the elders of the family who recite a number of punyaslokas or verses conveying good wishes and blessings (2. 229-235)

यावद्वयोरवनिः कुलावनिभृतः शेषः पथोराशय सूर्यः शीतरुचिर्दिश सुरपतिर्ब्रह्मा च सगै सह ।

"Rule thou the earth, o king, rejoicing in the fulfilment of thy desires as long as exist heaven and earth, the great mountain ranges, the serpent Ananta, the oceans, the sun and the moon, the regions of the sky, Indra and Brahman, and the created worlds with a soul as exalted as any of these, but crowned with a glory twice as great as theirs!"

"King of kings, let the sound of conch proclaim this message Recite quickly, o Brahman, Vedic verses charming with mystic formulas ensuring victory in battles! Send forthwith, o India, a chariot equipped with divine arms for vanquishing all foes! Come swiftly, ye guardians of the regions of the sky, to serve our king!" (2. 234)

The coronation over, Yaśodhara and his bride leave the river side pavilion and return to the city on the back of an elephant Yaśodhara briefly recounts what he said to himself at the sight of the gaily decorated city (2. 236-239)

सौधाग्रभागेषु पुराङ्गनानां नीलोत्पलस्पर्धिभिरीक्षणैर्मे ।

'The goddess embodying the beauty of yonder sky seems to be eager to shower flowers on me in her joy, using for the purpose the eyes, resembling blue lotus blossoms, of the women of the city, standing on the front terraces of the mansions' (2 237)

On arrival at the royal palace Yaśodhara is welcomed by a bard named Kirtisāhara

लक्ष्मीं बिभ्रद् ध्वजौवै क्वचिदनिलबलोल्लोखवीचेद्युनद्या-

"Thy palace, o king, sometimes looks beautiful as the Ganges with its wind-tossed ripples on account of the rows of flags flying over the top. Sometimes it looks beautiful as the mountain of the gods by virtue of the crimson lustre of its golden cupolas. Sometimes it reproduces the beauty of the ocean of nectar with its glistening white walls. Sometimes it resembles the Himālayas with its sky-touching domes. A mighty emblem of thy sovereignty, this palace is verily the toy-lotus of the goddess of wealth' It is the birth-place of Fame, and Dame Earth's own resting-place! It is the luxury mirror of the goddess of wealth, and the family mansion of the presiding goddess of the realm! It appears to be the play-ground of the goddess of learning!" (2 242-243).

c) MORNING SONGS

Verses recited by bards in the morning to awaken the king form an important component of court poetry, and in our work there are two sets of verses recited by the prabodha-mangala-pāthakas and the saukhasāyamikas respectively to arouse Yaśodhara from sleep (3 3-13, 14-22). The bright morning scenery is the theme of these verses, and there is also a personal touch in them, containing as they do occasional references to the king and his court.

d) A DISCUSSION AT THE COURT

An interesting discussion takes place at the court of Yaśodhara on the relative merits of fate and personal endeavour as governing principles of human conduct, followed by a diversion on topics relating to state-craft. Pronouncements on the respective claims of daiva and puruṣakāra are as old as the Mahābhārata, but they assume here the character of a formal debate designed to give the king practical hints in shaping his policy.

The discussion is opened by a minister named Vidyāmahodadhī, who, after stressing the importance of maintaining the secrecy of deliberations in the council-chamber, proclaims the supremacy of fate¹, and recommends the policy of least resistance, free from warlike adventures, and aimed at the peaceful enjoyment of the fruits of prosperity and the cultivation of justice and virtue. The minister argues that man toils and suffers for nothing: what is written on the forehead will come about even if he remains inactive. Indra is the lord of heaven and the serpent Ananta the mainstay of the earth, not because of any personal exertion on their part, but because they are fated to be so.

मघोनस्त्रिदिवैश्वर्ये शेषस्योद्धरणे भुवः । को नाम पौरुषारम्भस्तदत्र शरणं विधिः ॥ 3 37-8

As for warlike ventures, the very name of enemies is unpleasant, and their sight, too, hateful like that of serpents.

वर्तयामि हि शत्रूणां प्रक्षुभ्यति मनोऽम्बुधिः । कस्तान् दृष्टिपथे कुर्यान्नरः कुम्भीनसानिव ॥ 3 40

Fortifications and wise counsel are futile when fate decrees otherwise.

दुर्गं मन्दरकन्दराणि परिधिस्ते गोत्रधात्रीधराः । खेयं सप्त पयोधयः स्वविषयः स्वर्गः सुराः सैनिकाः ।

मन्त्री चास्य गुरुस्तथाप्ययमगात् प्रायः परेषां वशं देवादेवपतितस्तदत्र नृपः किं तत्रेण मन्त्रेण वा ॥

The Mandara caves are Indra's forts. The great mountain-ranges are his ramparts. The seven oceans are his moat. Heaven is his realm, the gods are his soldiers, and Brhaspati his minister. Yet, by the decree of fate, he was oftentimes subjugated by his foes. Sire, of what avail is then army or counsel on earth? (3 41)²

The king should, therefore, enjoy his great fortune in peace without forgetting the claims of virtue. The speaker concludes by saying:

धनं धर्मविलोपेन परभोगाय भूपते । पापं त्वात्मनि जायेत हरेर्द्विपवधादिव ॥

The wealth earned by a king by violating the right is enjoyed by others, he acquires only the sin for himself just as a lion acquires sin by killing an elephant, while the other beasts feed on the flesh (3 44).

The views of Vidyāmahodadhī are attacked by another minister described as a materialist, who regards personal endeavour as the sole guarantee of success. As a follower of Cārvāka doctrines, he cannot, of course, accept any unseen agency like fate, but his views in this respect do not materially differ from those of the Yogavāsistha, which, too, glorifies personal effort and denies the existence of fate,³ although a Cārvāka would not certainly accept its theory that the so-called fate of popular imagination

1 The Sūtrakṛtāṅga 2 1 12 describes a heretical school which regards Fate as the cause of everything. See also Jacob's Jaina Sūtras II (S B E), p. 35.

2 Very similar verses occur in Gunabhadra's Ātmānusāsana and Bhartṛhari's Nīṭisataka.

3 Mumukṣuprakaraṇa, chas. 6-9.

is nothing more than the sumtotal of the actions and desires of previous births¹

Arguing that all actions depend upon effort and not on passivity, the speaker goes on to show the futility of depending upon fate. Fate, for instance, is powerless to feed even a man who has food before him, but whose hands are tied. He who relies upon fate is bound to lose even the wealth he has acquired. Fate never guards a traveller who carries with him a bundle of jewels, but falls asleep on the way.

दैवावलम्बनवत् पुरुषस्य हस्तादासादितान्यपि धनानि भवन्ति दूरे ।

आनीय रत्ननिचयं पथि जातनिद्रे जागर्ति तत्र पथिके हि न जातु दैवम् ॥ ३. ४९.

The minister then applies his theory to the policy to be followed by the king.

विहाय पौरुषं यो हि दैवमेवावलम्बते । प्रासादसिंहवत्तस्य मूर्ध्नि तिष्ठन्ति वायसा ॥

Crows perch on the head of one who abandons effort and depends upon fate, just as they do on the head of a sculptured lion in a palace (3 50)

तेजोहीने महीपाले स्वा परे च विकुर्वते । निःशङ्कं हि न को धत्ते पदं भस्मन्यनूष्मणि ॥

When a king is devoid of vigour, both friend and foe prove disloyal. Who does not fearlessly tread on ashes that are cold?² (3 51)

अहंकारविहीनस्य किं विवेकेन भूभुजः । नरे कातरचित्ते हि कः स्यादस्त्रपरिग्रहः ॥

Intellect is of no use to a king who lacks in pride. A coward has no use for arms (3 52)

हर्षोऽमर्षश्च नो यस्य धनाय निधनाय च । को विशेषो भवेद्राज्ञस्तस्य चित्रगतस्य च ॥

What difference is there between a living king and a painted one, when his favour brings not riches nor his wrath destruction?² (3 53)

येषां बाहुबलं नास्ति येषां नास्ति मनोबलम् । तेषां चन्द्रबलं देव किं कुर्यादम्बरस्थितम् ॥

What, o king, can the power of the moon in the sky³ do for those who have no strength in their arms nor any strength of mind? (3 54)

The speaker, therefore, appeals to the king to exert his valour and triumph over his enemies. He urges valiant action and a resolute attempt to expand the existing prosperity, and concludes by saying

लब्ध्वाप्यनन्यसामान्यसाहसं नायकं विना । लक्ष्मीर्न निर्भराश्लेषा प्रमदेव जरत्पतौ ॥

Just as a woman does not closely embrace her decrepit husband, similarly

1 Cf. Matsyapurāṇa 221. 2 स्वनेव कर्म दैवाख्यं देहान्तराजितम्. The Jain Amitagatī also identifies fate with the Karma of previous births, representing it as an all-powerful agency which none can escape. Subhāsitaratnasamdhā, verses 343-374.

2 Cf. Bhāṛavi 2 20

3 1. a. planetary influence goddess of wealth, though possessed by someone, does not closely ere to him unless he is a hero of uncommon courage (3 59)

The next speaker is a minister named Kavikulāśekhara who tries to ct a compromise between the views of the two previous speakers recognises both fate and effort as determining factors in the life man, although he gives greater importance to effort, and his point view is the same as that developed in the Mahābhārata (Anuśāsanaparva, p. 6), which likewise admits the existence of fate, but lays by far greater emphasis on personal endeavour¹

Kavikulāśekhara opines that when success comes without being berately aimed at, it is to be attributed to fate, in all other cases onal exertion must be held to be the determining cause When a ent comes in contact with a man in his sleep and he remains unhurt, his ty is to be attributed to fate, but when the reptile is seen and avoided, the rmining factor is one's personal effort Fate and personal effort n help each other, and their mutual relation is like that of medicine and vitality of a patient (3 61-63)

अप्रेक्षापूर्विका यत्र कार्यसिद्धिं प्रजायते । तत्र दैव नृवान्यत्र प्रधानं पौरुषं भवेत् ॥

सुप्तस्य सर्पसप्तके दैवमायुषि कारणम् । दृष्टानुवञ्चिते सर्पे पौरुषं तत्र कारणम् ॥

परस्परोपकारेण जीवितौषधयोरिव । दैवपौरुषयोर्द्वैति फलजन्मनि मन्यताम् ॥

ertheless the speaker recognises personal endeavour as the governing ciple of human activity and dismisses fate as something outside the ge of sense experience² (3 64)

तथापि पौरुषायत्ता. सत्त्वानां सकला क्रिया । अतस्तच्चिन्त्यमन्यत्र का चिन्तातीन्द्रियात्मनि ॥

youthful minister, Upāyasarvajña by name, protests against this oretical discussion, declaring that the king's council-chamber is not a ol nor is the time opportune for an academic controversy He, therefore,

1 The Matsyapurāṇa (Chap. 221) admits a third factor, kāla, (दैव पुरुषकारश्च कालश्च पुरुषोत्तम । त्रयमेतन्मनुष्यस्य पिण्डितं स्यात् फलवद्दम् ॥) but gives the palm to puruṣakāra The Sūtrakṛtāṅga 1 1 2. 4 gives equal importance to fate and human exertion. See also Jacob's Jaina Sūtras, II, p 240 They are treated as mutually dependent in Haribhadra's Vimśa-tvīmśikā, section 5

2 Cf Yogavāśiṣṭha, op cit, 7 6 The discussion of the ministers reminds one of the tenets of the early Jewish sects about destiny and free will The Essenes exempted nothing from the sway of destiny The Sadducees denied destiny altogether The Pharisees 'held the middle ground—some things, but not all, are the work of destiny, some are in man's own power to determine whether they shall come to pass or not Moore Judaism, Vol I, p 457 The Sadducees supposed that 'all our actions are in our own power' The Pharisees ascribed everything to fate, and yet allowed that to do right or wrong is within the power of each individual, although fate does co-operate in his action Peters. The Religion of the Hebrews, p 421 calls attention to matters of political import, confining himself to questions of foreign policy, which can be narrowed down to the problem of dealing with hostile or rival kings. Although the speaker is convinced of the might of his king, he recommends the utmost caution in adopting war as an expedient. In the first place, if the desired object can be attained by diplomacy, it is useless to resort to war who, for instance, climbs a mountain in search of honey if he can get it on the Mandāra tree?

In the second place, a king should take up arms only when all other means, conciliation, gifts and sowing dissension, have been tried and found wanting. It is useless to take up arms when the desired result can be obtained by conciliation who, for instance, administers poison when death can be caused with molasses?

साम्ना दानेन भेदेन यत् कार्यं नैव सिध्यति । तत्र दण्डं प्रयोक्तव्यो नृपेण श्रियमिच्छता ॥

सामसाध्येषु कार्येषु को हि शस्त्रं प्रयोजयेत् । मृतिहेतुर्गुडो यत्र कस्तत्र विषदायकः ॥ 3. 91, 92

The speaker pertinently asks, how much can be achieved by the sword? A man has, after all, one body and two hands there are enemies at every step, and even an insignificant foe can be extremely troublesome (3. 90)

एकं वयुरुभौ हस्तौ शस्त्रवश्च पदे पदे । दुःखकृत् कण्टकोऽपि स्यात् कियत् खड्गेन साध्यते ॥

When war is decided upon, it is the duty of a king to adopt defensive measures for his own realm a king who neglects to do so is like a man who takes off his underwear to cover his head with

अकृत्वा निजदेशस्य रक्षां यो विजिगीषते । स नृपः परिधानेन वृत्तमौलिः पुमानिव ॥ 3. 74

There are three periods in the life of a king that of superiority to an enemy, that of equality with an enemy, and that of inferiority to him. It is in the first of these that warlike operations should be undertaken. Fighting with a powerful enemy is like fighting with an elephant on foot, while a clash between two equals, like that of two raw vessels, leads to the destruction of both. A powerful enemy should be attacked, like a wild elephant, by a combination of forces, while an equal should be subdued by employing others against him, just as one captures an elephant with the help of other elephants (3. 81-3)

उदयं समतां हानिस्तयः काला महीमुजाम् । तत्राद्य एव योद्धव्यं स्यात्तदयमुभयोः पुनः ॥

अममज्जवयुद्धे समेनोभयतः क्षयः । एनं प्रबन्धयेदन्यैर्गजं प्रतिगजैरिव ॥

No enemy, however small, should be neglected, mighty elephants often meet with death at the hands of lion cubs. Sowing dissension among enemies is an important step a king neglecting this is like a man who pulls at bamboos interlaced in tall clumps A king without power is like a lame man, unable to use his intelligence, and a king without intelligence is like a blind man, unable to use his power

Bravery and loyalty count more in an army than numbers A brave, well-equipped and efficient army, though small, contributes to success, provided it is loyal, a mere conglomeration of heads serves no useful purpose Loyalty is an important factor, and a king who causes disaffection among his loyal subjects is bound to come to grief like a man who awakens a sleeping cobra

In spite of the caution recommended by the speaker himself in matters affecting war, he ends by asking the king to send an expeditionary force against those whom a false sense of power has made overbearing and proud

The chief minister Nītibhaṣpati approves the foregoing speech, and, for his part, gives some advice to the king He asks the king to look after the kingdom as a gardener does a garden, and reiterates the warning not to despise enemies, however small

e) A CHALLENGE TO OTHER KINGS

We have next a specimen of a challenge to various kings and peoples, which the royal clerk, ordered by the king, reads out to the envoy, entrusted with the message

गर्वं बर्बरं मुञ्च मा चरत रे पञ्चालकाश्चापलं केलिं केरल संहार प्रविश रे मद्रेश देशान्तरम् ।

मिथ्यैश्वर्यबलावलेपरभसभ्रद्वयद्विवेकात्मनामिथ्य वष्टिरिदिद्धितं न सहते देव स दैवाश्रयः ॥

शौण्डीर्यशालिनि जगत्त्रयलब्धवर्णे देवे न य प्रणतिभावमुपैति भूप ।

तस्याहवेषु वयसां शिरसि प्रबन्धो यद्वाश्रमेषु परलोकधिया जटानाम् ॥

“Thou Barbara, renounce thy pride. Ye men of Pañcāla, be not wanton. Chief of Kerala, wind up thy amusements. King of Madra, take refuge in another land The great king (Yaśodhara), who believes in his destiny, will not tolerate your misdemeanour You have forthwith lost all power of discernment through a false pride of wealth and power The king who does not submit to His Majesty, magnanimous and renowned in all the three worlds, shall have birds of prey pouncing on his head fallen on the battlefield, or have a tangled mass of hair on the head, passing his days in holy resorts, with his mind fixed on the world beyond¹ (3 112-3)

Luckily this arrogant message does not seem to have been delivered, for the author says that, in spite of the king's order to deliver a message like this, an envoy should regulate his speech and conduct according to the temperament and resources of the court he visits

f) VERSES AGAINST MINISTERS

The report of the spy against a wicked minister of Yaśodhara gives occasion to a poetical outburst against ministers in general, which is all the more interesting as the relevant verses are attributed to various poets whose names are clearly mentioned. It is difficult to say whether these names are fictitious or refer to real personages. The former alternative seems to be the more probable, as in the foregoing sections also various verses have been attributed to bards or speakers whose names are obviously fictitious, and seem to have been introduced to lend a graphic character to the narrative. It may, however, be pointed out that the section on ministers belongs to a somewhat different category, as the verses here are given in the form of a regular anthology, and look like quotations from different poets. It is not impossible that some of the names refer to poets who were Somadeva's contemporaries or obscure writers, now forgotten, but we cannot be certain on the point. It is also noteworthy that certain names, e. g., Mugdhānganā-keli-kutūhala, Vilāsini-locana-kajjala, and Praudha-priyāpānganavotpala are too artificial to be real, although, as a matter of fact, fantastic names of poets are not quite rare in the Sanskrit Anthologies.

The chief value of this collection of verses lies in the fact that it is the nearest approach to political satire that we have in Sanskrit literature before Ksemendra. Treatment of questions relating to Niti or public policy is constantly found in the Mahākāvyas, but we have here a body of satirical verse directed against the ministers of kings, and there is at the end a set of verses which have for target a particular minister, and constitute a personal attack on him.

Tarunī-līlā-vilāsa is the author of a prelude to what he calls the drama of a minister's villainy

चञ्चापञ्चजनाकृति क्षितिपतिर्यत्राभवञ्चायक पौरो भाग्यपुराणपालितमतिर्मन्त्री धवित्रीसुत ।
स प्रौढोक्तिवृहस्पतिश्च तरुणीलीलाविलास कविस्तदुर्मन्त्रिदुरीहित विजयते सूक्तोत्कटं नाटकम् ॥

The drama of a wicked minister's villainy thrives indeed well. It is full of excellent precepts. A king resembling a figure of straw is its hero.

1 i. e. defeat will cause him to renounce the world.

The citizens are nurtured on the myth of Fate, and the minister is the son of a blacksmith's wife. And there is a poet in the drama, Tarunilāvilāsa by name, he is Bihaspātī himself in forceful composition (3 125)

सुलोष्टचेष्ट क्षितिपः स्वभावात् सुदुष्टचेष्ट सचिवश्च यत्र ।

शुभाशयस्यापि सुमेधसोऽपि क्षेम कुतस्तत्र भवेज्जनस्य ॥

'How can even a man, honest and intelligent, be happy in a realm where the king is, by nature, like a clod of earth, and the minister a perfect villain?' (3, 126)

'How can the good live under a king with a wicked minister? How can small birds live on a tree where the mastery belongs to a hawk?' (3, 127).

दुर्मन्त्रिणो नृपसुतात् सुमहान् स लाभ प्राणैः समं भवति यन्न वियोगभावः ॥

सूनाकृतो गृहसुपत्य ससारमेयं जीवन् मृगो यदि निरेति तदस्य पुण्यम् ॥

When a person is not deprived of his life by a prince with a wicked minister, it must be reckoned a mighty favour. When a stag comes out alive, after entering the dog-guarded house of a butcher, it must be due to his religious merit (3 130).

Kavi-kaumudī-candī declares

अहिचलयितमूल पादपः केन सेव्यः श्रयति क इह शिष्टः शस्यसंगं तडागम् ।

विषकलुषितमन्धः कस्य भोज्याय जातं कुसचिवहतभूतिर्भूपति कैरपास्यः ॥

अविवेकमतिनृपतिर्मन्त्री गुणवत्सु वक्रितग्रीवः । यत्र खलाश्च प्रबलास्तत्र कथं सज्जनावसरः ॥

Who can resort to a tree that has a serpent coiled round its trunk? What wise man enters a tank with thorns in it? Who ever partakes of poisoned food? Who can serve a king whose welfare is marred by a villain of a minister? How can the good have any scope in a realm where the king lacks in discernment, the minister turns his face away from those who have merit, and villains are in power? (3 131-2)

Two verses are attributed to a poet named Vīdagdhamugdha, but they depend for force upon double entendre, and can be appreciated only in the original.

खड्गेषु परकोश शोषाय तण्डुला करे पर्वः । चतुरङ्गेषु च तत्र दुर्मन्त्रिणि भवति भूपस्य ॥

Nitinetra mentions the characteristics of a wicked minister

राज्यवृद्धिस्ततोऽमात्याद्यो न कुक्षिभरि स्वयम् । अतिस्थालयेव चेद्भक्तभोक्तुर्भवेत् कुतः ॥

यः स्याद्भुजगवद्भूयो बहिरीक्षितमोहितः । तस्मादन्नं न किं नानलज्जितोऽहं सेवका ॥

The prosperity of a kingdom can be enhanced only by a minister who is not greedy. How can the owner eat if the cooking-vessel itself eats up the rice? Is not the king who is charmed by outward looks, like a libertine, ruined by his servants, like whores? (3. 135-6).

कोशोद्भासी प्रजाध्वसी तत्रक्षोभविधायक । यो विद्वेष्टा विशिष्टानां शत्रुर्मन्त्रिमिषादसौ ॥

An enemy he is in the guise of a minister, who empties the royal treasury, ruins the people, stirs up rebellion in the army, and does harm to the leading citizens (3. 138)

Mānadhanañjaya says

नृपतिमुत. खलनिरत सचिवजनो दुर्जनोऽधन सुजन । महता मस्तकशूल जातैश्चर्यं कदर्यश्च ॥

A prince devoted to villains and a wicked minister, and the virtuous pool, and the wealthy miser cause headache to the wise (3. 140)

Kavikoviḍa dwells on the wiles of ministers

यदीच्छसि वशीकर्तुं महीश गुणय द्वयम् । बहुमायामय वृत्तं चित्तं चाकरुणामयम् ॥

If you wish to bring a king under your control, cultivate two things, an extremely deceitful character and a cruel heart (3. 142).

बहिरलघुरसप्रभवैरन्त शून्यार्थपाटवै सचिवै । मुग्धमृगा प्रतिदिवस वद्वयन्ते मरुमरीचिकाशङ्कै ॥

Like a mirage in a desert, the ministers daily deceive those (thirsty) deer, the simpletons. Outwardly they have charming manners, but inwardly they are good for nothing (3. 143)

काय स्वस्याभिमते सचिव सिद्धि करोति हठवृत्त्या । नृपतिरय बहुसचिव के वयमत्रेति भाषतेऽन्यस्य ॥

A minister executes a task even by violent means when it serves his purpose. But when it serves the purpose of another, he simply says. 'The king has so many ministers, what authority have I?' (3. 144).

Abhimāna-mahidhara says

वक्ष्ये विधे न सुविधि काम्येऽर्थे याच्यसे तथापीदम् । कुह मरणं माकार्षी सुजनानां दुर्जनैः संगम् ॥

Albeit thou grantest not our desires, o Fate, we beg this favour of thee inflict death upon us, but never cause the good to associate with villains (3. 148).

मन्त्रावसरे समरे विधुरे दारेषु वस्तुसारेषु । यो न व्यभिचरति नृपे स कथं तु न वल्लभस्तस्य ॥

He who is faithful to a king in deliberations, war and adversity, and in respect of his wife and treasures, is bound to be dear to him (3. 149)

Avyādhidurbala enumerates certain things that are not likely to happen

क्षाराब्धौ सलिलस्य दुर्जनजने विद्याविनोदस्य च क्षुद्रे संभ्रमभाषितस्य कृपणे लक्ष्मीविलासस्य च ।

भूये दु सचिवगमस्य सुजने वारिद्वयमस्य च ध्वस स्यादचिरेण यत्र दिवसे तं चिन्तयन् दुर्बल ॥

I am tired of waiting for the day when the waters will forthwith cease to exist in the salt ocean, when villains will cease to profess love of learning, when mean fellows will cease to be addressed with respect, when misers will cease to have joy of wealth, when kings will cease to have wicked ministers, and when honest persons will cease to be poor (3 150).

Kavikusumāyudha is rather emphatic in what he says:

यदि तव हृदयं सनयं विद्वन् स्वमेऽपि मा स्म सेविष्या । सचिवजितं युवतिजितं खड्गजितं खलजितं च राजानम् ॥

उपलः सलिलेषु तरेज्जलधिर्गाभेत मन्दरः प्रचरेत् । इति संभवति कदाचिन्नाखलभावः पुन सचिव ॥

If thou hast any sense of right, o wise man, never, even in a dream, resort to a king dominated by a minister or a young woman or a swordsman or a villain. A stone may float on water, the ocean may turn shallow, and the Mandara mountain may move, all this may one day happen, but never will there be a minister who is not a villain (3 152-3)

Sujanajīvita is hard both on kings and ministers

विश्वस्तं महिमास्तं सुजन विजनं कुलीनमसुहीनम् । गुणिनं च दुःखकणिनं कुर्यादिति सचिवसिद्धान्तः ॥

कुसुदाकर इव दिनकृति विरमति नृपतिर्नरे सरागे हि । स लघु विरक्ते रज्यति रजनिरसश्चूर्णरजसीव ॥

‘The faithful should be degraded, good men isolated, the highborn killed, and the virtuous made miserable’: such is the doctrine of ministers. A king ceases to love a loyal person, just as a night lotus-bed ceases to bloom at the sight of the sun. He suddenly becomes attached to one who is disloyal, just as fluid turmeric sticks to pulverised lime (3 156-7).

Mugdhānganā-keḥkutūhala describes how ministers dissuade the king from helping good and pious men

ज्वराते इव लिखेत मन्त्री सत्सु धनव्यये । कृतार्थे इव मोदेत विट-वाग्जीवनादिषु ॥

भस्मनि हुतमिव महते यद्दत्तं देव तदफलं सकलम् । उपयोगिने तु देयं नटाय विटपेटकायापि ॥

पिण्डीशूरा केवलममी हि सर्वस्वभक्षणे दक्षाः । न हि यामार्थं सन्तः स्वामिन् भटपेटिकार्थं वा ॥

A minister would be pained, like a man suffering from fever, if money were spent for the benefit of honest people. But he would rejoice like a man who has achieved success, if it were spent on libertines, panegyrists and the like. (He says to the king) ‘Sire, what is given to the pious is all useless, like an oblation offered on ashes. Money should be given to those who serve an useful purpose, even to dancers and pimps. Those pious fellows are merely gluttons, expert in consuming their substance. Sire, they do not keep watch at night nor do they contribute to the maintenance of the warriors.’ (3 158-60).

Vilāsinilocanakajjala refers to the misappropriation of public money by ministers

यदल्पं दर्शयतेऽमाल्यैः फलमाकाशजं क्वचित् । तत्सर्वस्वापहाराय मुग्धेषु पुरधूर्तवत् ॥

संभावयत्यमाल्योऽयं यत् स्वमेव महीभुजि । तदन्यस्माद्विवेकोऽस्य मा भून्मयि धनाशिलि ॥

If ministers sometimes show to ignorant kings a slight transitory profit from some investment, it is with a view to misappropriating the entire amount, just as certain jackals, showing to the lion a small portion of the game, ate all of it themselves¹ A minister creates an impression of his own honesty on the mind of the king lest the latter should find out the truth from another while he is misappropriating² public money (3. 162-3).³

Sārastanī-kartava-kautuka, after pointing out that the evil accompanies the good, depicts a minister as a kind of monster.

जीवोऽसर्व सुधारभोघौ भूपाले प्रबला. खला. । सदर्पाश्चन्दने सर्पा न रत्नमनुपद्रवम् ॥

The great submarine fire burns in the ocean of nectar, villains are in power in the court of a king, and fierce serpents are found on the sandal tree. No gem is there without some blemish (3 165)

ग्रहो ग्रहाणामसुरोऽसुराणा यमो यमस्यापि नृपस्य मन्त्री ।

एव न चेदेष कथं नु जीवेदकारणं कोविदकामकाल ॥

द्विजिह्वो जन्तूना मृगयतिरिभानामिव कुले तडिहण्डोऽद्रीणामयमसमरोचि क्षितिरुहाम् ।

हिमावनोऽब्जानां तपतपनकालश्च सरसामभूत् क्रूर. कोऽपि प्रकृतिखलभावेन महताम् ॥

The minister of a king is a planet among the harmful planets, a demon among demons, and death of death If it is not so, how does he manage to exist without any justifying cause, he who frustrates the desires of all wise men² A minister is born among the great, savagely cruel by reason of his vile nature, like a serpent among the creatures, like a lion among the elephants, like a thunder-bolt over the mountains, like a fire among the trees, like a screen of frost over the lotuses, and like the hot summer among the pools of water (3 166-7)

Praudha-priyāpānga-navotpala says

तत्र कथं ननु सन्तो यत्रास्ते तच्चतुष्टय युगपत् । कलिकाल. खलकालो नृपकाल सचिवकालश्च ॥

How can the good live in a place where these four live simultaneously: the Death-like Kali Age, Death-like villains, a Death-like king, and a Death-like minister! (3 169)

The verses of the remaining poets are directed against the wicked minister Pāmarodāra, and contain various charges against his character. The poet Aśvattha says

1 See Śrutasāgara's commentary

2 वनाशिन means literally 'one who eats money' 'Eating money' is the Assamese expression for 'misappropriation' Compare also rōkka tinnu in Kannada and paue khāñ in Marāṭhi

3 "The emperor's councillors are swindlers," declares a chronicler speaking of the conditions in Germany on the eve of the Reformation, "they nearly all grow rich while the emperor grows poor" Quoted by Janssen History of the German People at the close of the Middle Ages, II 84

परमहिलाः कुलमहिला. परिजनवनिता विनोदवनिताश्च । रतिरसभाण्ड रण्डास्तापस्वश्चास्य गृहदास्यः ॥

The wives of others are, as it were, his married wives. The wives of his relatives are his companions of joy. Whores are the object of his love and affection. Nuns are his serving maids (3 206).

The young poet Bhaṛata (Bhaṛata-bāla-kavi), after accusing the minister of dishonesty and corruption, exposes his hypocrisy.

परचित्तरत. परदाररत. परवञ्चनवृत्तिचरित्ररतः । अधमध्वजवशभव. सचिव समभूतव देव तम प्रभवः ॥

Sire, thy minister, belonging to a degenerate oilman's family, was born as the source of sin. He is addicted to the wealth of others, addicted to the wives of others, and addicted to the habit of cheating others (3 201)

करिपुरगरथनरोत्करविहारसंहारिताखिलप्राणी । संचरति राष्ट्रमध्ये नादत्ते पादुकायुगलम् ॥

दलकुलफलानि तरोर्नोन्धति किल तत्र जीवपीडेति । यम इव सकलांश्च पुनर्देवद्विजितापसान् ग्रसते ॥

'He travels in the kingdom, destroying numerous creatures by the reckless march of his elephants, horses, chariots and camp-followers, but does not wear a pair of shoes (for fear of hurting animal life)! He plucks no leaves, flowers, and fruits of trees lest he should hurt any sentient being, but, like the god of death, he destroys all gods (i. e. idols), Brāhmanas and hermits.' (3. 210-11)

Puruḥūta gives the following estimate of Pāmarodāra's character.

मानवति मानदलनो गुणवति गुणगोपनः स्वतः परत । कुलशीलशौर्यशालिषु विशेषतो नृषु च कीनाशः ॥

क्षारोदधिरिव सुधियां चण्डालजलाशयोपम. कृतिनाम् । मरुमालकूपकल्प. सतां च तव देव सांप्रतं सचिव. ॥

नदा विदा. किराटाश्च पटुवाचाटतोक्तटा । सचिवे तव चेष्टन्तां कटके प्रकटश्रिय ॥

'He wounds the pride of those who are proud, and conceals the merit of those who are meritorious, either himself or with the help of others. He is Death particularly to those who are high-born, good-natured and brave. Sire, thy minister is at the moment like the salt ocean in his dealings with persons of talent. For the virtuous he is like a Caṇḍāla's tank For the good he is like a rocky well in a desert. So long as thy minister is in office, may dancers, libertines, swindlers and glib tattlers thrive in thy camp!' (3 216, 218, 220).

हे वत्स दौर्जन्य किमम्ब माये क. सांप्रतं नाबुचितो निवासः ।

वदामि मात. शृणु सोऽस्ति नूनं य पामरोदारगिराधराङ्क ॥

(Deceit) 'Child Villainy!' (Villainy) 'What sayst thou, mother Deceit?' (Deceit) 'What will now be our fitting abode?' (Villainy) 'I say, mother, hear. There it is, a symbol of meanness, under the name Pāmarodāra!' (3. 224)

Sarasvatitūḍaga makes the final attack

स्वयं कर्ता स्वयं हर्ता स्वयं वक्ता स्वयं कवि । स्वयं नटः स्वयं भण्डो मञ्जी विश्वाकृतिस्तव ॥

'Thy minister appears in an endless variety of rôles He is himself creator and destroyer both. He is himself the speaker and the poet, the dancer and the clown!' (3. 225).

In addition to the verses attributed to various poets, a number of verses on the much hated ministers is interspersed in the report of the spy, the line of attack being very much the same

बहिरविकृतवेषैर्मन्दमन्दप्रचारैर्निभृतनयनपातैः साधुताकारसारैः ।

निहृतिनयविनीतैश्चान्तरेतैरमालैस्त्रिमय इव बकोटैर्वेष्टिताः के न लोकाः ॥

दूराद्दीर्घमवेक्षणं सरभसः प्रीतिक्रम संभ्रम प्रत्यासन्नमथासनं प्रियकथाचारे महानादरः ।

बाह्योऽयं सचिवेषु चेष्टितविधिः कामं न क मोदयेच्छित्तेहा तु न जातु मार्दवमयी मन्ये जनन्यामपि ॥

None there is who is not deceived by these ministers, as the fishes are by the cranes They are immaculate in outward appearance and dress, walk slowly, and cast steadfast glances A pretence of honesty is their asset, and they are trained in their inmost hearts in the art of deception (3. 191). They look intently at a visitor even from a distance, receive him with effusive courtesy and respect, offer him a seat near themselves, and cordially indulge in pleasant talks. Who is not supremely delighted by their outward deportment? But, methinks, they have no pity in their hearts even for their mothers (3. 193).

g) MINOR THEMES OF COURT POETRY

Among other verses incidental to court life may be mentioned those attributed to the Sandhivigrahins, announcing the arrival of the envoys of different princes at Yaśodhara's court (3. 246-9), the verses containing the challenge of his warriors to the king of Pañcāla (3. 405ff), and the eulogistic verses recited by the bard Mārgaṇamalla during Yaśodhara's archery practice (3. 466-72). There are also groups of verses which describe various court festivals. One such group is connected with the spring festival when the god of love is worshipped by the king. The latter is asked to put on vernal attire in a series of verses (3. 447-56), while the sport of swings which forms part of the festivities in honour of Cupid is described in the verses quoted below:

नवकिसलयपूगीपादपस्तम्भशोभाः सिततरुफलकान्ताशोकवह्निप्रतानाः ।

मणिकुसुमदुकूलोलोचकेतुप्रकान्तास्तव नृपवर दोलाः कुर्वतां कामितानि ॥

वक्रं वक्रसुपैति वक्र नयने नेत्रप्रतिस्पर्धिनी वक्षः पीनपयोधराग्रकलनात् सोल्लासलीलान्तरम् ।

हस्तौ हस्तमयीपवृत्तिबलितौ जङ्घे च जङ्घाश्रिते दोलान्दोलनमङ्गनार्पितभरं तत् कस्य न प्रीतये ॥

'May the swings, o best of kings, fulfil thy desires! They are beautiful with poles of areca trees with fresh young leaves, and fitted with branching Aśoka creepers with camphor wood boards attached to the ends Charming they are with canopies and banners of silk set with flower-shaped gems Who is not delighted by the oscillation of the swings, the women adding their weight? During the sport, mouth comes near mouth, eyes meet eyes, the heart is enraptured at the contact of the partner's high projecting bosom, hands move close to hands, and legs are entwined with legs ' (3. 447, 458)

A bard named Śūnāsūkta recites a few verses (3. 462-464) describing to the king the Festival of Lights (dipotsava)

धूतोन्मादितकामिनीजितधृतप्राणेशचाटूकटः क्रीडद्वारविलासिनीजनभवद्भूषाविकल्पोद्भटः ।

आतोद्यध्वनिमङ्गलारवभरव्याजृम्भिताशामुख. प्रीतिं पूर्णमनोरथस्य भवतः पुष्यात् प्रदीपोत्सवः ॥

'May the Festival of Lights bring delight to thee, whose desires are fulfilled! It is enlivened by the flattering words of lovers, defeated in gambling, and held fast by their mistresses, excited by the game. It is charming with the varied adornment of the courtesans, engaged in sports. The regions of the sky resound with the deep auspicious notes of instrumental music ' (3. 463).

The blessings of the goddess Aparājitā are invoked on the occasion of the Mahānavamī festival by a bard named Vijayajaitrāyudha for the victory of the king on the battlefield (3. 459-61)

सप्राप्तेऽप्रजयाय चिन्तितविधौ चिन्तामणिर्भूभुजां या सा स्वादपराजिता तव मुहुर्जैत्राय धात्रीपते ॥

'May Aparājitā contribute to thy victory oft and anon, o king! In the sword of kings she is incarnate as a Sword, and in their bow she assumes the shape of a Bow. She is incarnate as Arrow in their arrows and as Arm in their arms, and assumes the form of an armour round their bodies. she is as a Wishing Gem in fulfilling their desire for triumph in battles.' (3. 459).

The blessings of Sarasvatī are similarly invoked during the Pūrva-ranga ceremony in the court theatre on the occasion of dance performances, and we have here a specimen hymn to Sarasvatī recited on such occasions (3. 261-268).

भूवासमानसविभूषणहारयष्टिवाङ्गदेवता नृप तवातनुतां हितानि ॥

संध्यासु प्रतिवासरं श्रुतिधृतिर्बद्धा प्रणामाञ्जलिं योगस्वापमुपेत्य दुग्धजलधौ शेषाश्रितः श्रीपतिः ।

शशुभ्यार्थयति चाक्षसूत्रचलयं कृत्वा करेऽनन्यधीर्देवि स्वल्पदपङ्कजद्वयमिदं सर्वार्थकामप्रदम् ॥

'May the Goddess of speech confer benefits on thee, o king! She is a swan abiding in the lotus mouths of the gods, a spray of jewels adorning the ears of the Vidyādharas, a pearlstring embellishing the minds of mortals! Everyday at morn, noon and eve, Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva intently contemplate thy lotus feet that grant all objects and desires, o goddess' Brahmā, by folding his hands in obeisance, Viṣṇu that lies on the serpent Ananta in the Ocean of Milk, by resorting to Yogic trance, and Śiva, by holding in his hand a rosary of Rudrākṣa beads! (3. 264-5).

h) PANEGRYICS

Panegyrics are an essential feature of court poetry, and there are several of them in Yasastilaka. The following specimens are from among the verses addressed to Mārādatta by the ascetic boy and the ascetic girl.

कर्पूरद्रुमगर्भधूलिधवलं यत् केतकानां त्विषः श्रेतिज्ञा परिभूय चन्द्रमहसा सार्धं प्रतिस्पर्धते ।

रिपुकुलतिमिरनिकरदावानल जगति तनोषि मङ्गल दिवि भुवि विदिशि दिशि च विबुधार्चितं धाम दधासि संततम् ।
सुवनाम्भोजसरसि महतां मत दिशसि विबोधनश्रिय धर्मेविनोद भूप तव भानुमतश्च न किञ्चिदन्तरम् ॥

'The wives of the semi-divine Siddhas sing thy fame on the Himalayan peaks White as the inner dust of camphor trees, and bright as the lustre of the milk in mature coconuts, thy fame vies with moonbeams, surpassing in whiteness the radiance of Ketakas in bloom' (1. 155). Sire, may the tree of thy fame delight the universe for endless ages! The stars are its flowers, the moon is its fruit, the ripples of the celestial Ganges are its leaves, the mount of Kailāsa is its trunk, the Ocean of Milk is its watering basin, the serpent Ananta is its root, and all the regions of the sky are its branches' (1. 165). No difference is there between thee and the sun, o king, delighting in religious virtue Thou who art a forest-fire in destroying the expanse of darkness, to wit, thy foes, thou dost good to the world Thou who art honoured by the wise, ever dost thou radiate thy brilliance in heaven, on earth, and in the regions and corners of the sky. Thou who art esteemed by the great, thou dost create the beauty of bloom in the lotuspool of the world' (1. 169)

Battle-scenes, a favourite theme of Kāvya poetry, are described in Yasastilaka (3. 437-441)

क्रोधावेशप्रधावोद्भटसुभटघटाविर्भवन्मूलबन्धस्तूर्णत्वङ्गुत्तुरङ्गाननपवनवशावेशविस्तारसारः ।

आसीदत्स्वन्दनाग्रध्वजनिभृतभरः पर्यटकुञ्जरेन्द्रस्कारव्यापारकर्णाहतिविततशिखः पाँसुरुर्ध्वं व्यधावीत् ॥

The dust of the battlefield sped high, originating from the multitudes of warriors vehemently rushing forward in a paroxysm of rage, and was spread far and wide by the pantings of the swiftly galloping chargers. Masses of it were held fast by the banners on the top of the advancing chariots, and its topmost layer was dispersed by the extensive flappings of the ears of the loving elephants (3 437).

II SCENES OF NATURE

Nature poetry is adequately represented in Yasastilaka, some of the descriptions being put in the mouth of the bards of Yaśodhara's court and addressed to the king. While Somadeva's portrayal of natural scenery will not bear comparison with the classic descriptions of the earlier poets, it is not wanting in genuine touches which reveal the poet's sympathy with Nature and his accurate powers of observation. There are elaborate pictures of the seasons and morning and evening scenery as well as glimpses of animal life, and it may be said, on the whole, that the poet's verses on the subject often have rapidity of movement and show a comprehensive grasp of details.

A large number of verses is devoted to the seasons (1. 53-68; 3. 376-387, 389-401, 425-435, 442-446).

सशुष्यत्सरिति कथत्तनुमति स्वान्तोद्बोर्जाहृति श्रीप्तेऽस्मिन् महति क्षयामयचिति प्राञ्चन् मृति गच्छति ॥

In the summer the sun shines bright, the winds radiate heat, the regions of the sky are made fierce like flames, the mountains wither, the sky is ablaze, and perspiration gleams on the visage of men. The rivers dry up, the creatures are scorched, Love loses its force, and the disease of consumption prevails. A wanderer at the height of summer meets with death (3. 377).

मार्तण्डश्चण्डतापस्तपति मरुभुवामग्निसाव दधान काम व्योमान्तराणि स्थगयति किमपि द्योति धावत् पुरस्तात् ।

ऊर्ध्वं निर्धामवीचीचयमिव विसृज्येतदाशान्तरालं मशाङ्गान् निम्नगानां पयसि च करिण. काथयन् वाति वात. ॥

Fierce with heat, the sun doth shine, setting the deserts on fire. A mysterious luminosity, moving before the eyes, intensely pervades the regions of the sky. Yonder horizon seems to belch forth waves of vapour. The wind blows, scorching the elephants, immersed in the waters of rivers (1. 60).

The king is asked to resort to the refreshing shade of the gardens in the summer.

कृतकिसलयशय्याः प्रान्तचूतप्रतानाः स्तवकरचितकुड्यास्तत्प्रसूनोपहाराः ।

जलसरणिसमीरासारसारा प्रियाणां कुचकलशविलासैर्निर्विशोद्यानभूमी ॥

Enjoy the gardens, delightful with breezes from the ivy-leaves, accompanied by the graceful movements of the plump bosoms of thy mistresses. Beds of leaves are made in them, and mango groves are on the borders. The garden walls are made of clusters of flowers, and blossoms are strewn on the ground." (3 378)

The effect of the summer heat on certain familiar birds and animals is described in the following verse

मध्याह्नेऽज्ञाय बाहाश्चदुलतरसुरास्तोयमार्गं लज्जन्ति स्थानायानेतुमीशाः पयसि कृतरतीन् हस्तिनी नैव मिण्डाः ।

ओषोत्तुण्डः सिस्त्रण्डी विमृशति शिशिरान् कन्दरद्रोणिदेशान् स्वेच्छं कच्छेषु चेमाः कमलदलतलं वारलाः सञ्चयन्ति ॥

At noon the horses quickly leave the channels of water with ever swift hooves. The keepers fail to bring home the elephants playing in the waters. The peacock, raising his beak from heat, seeks cool caves and valleys, and yonder female swans rest as they like under lotus leaves on the borders of streams (1. 61)

The rainy season is brought into special connection with love and described with gusto and enthusiasm

उन्मार्गाग्मसि मेघमन्दनभसि छत्रांशुमत्तेजसि क्षुभ्यत्स्रोतसि रुद्रपान्थतरसि स्फूर्जत्तडिङ्गयसि ।

कन्दर्पौकसि मत्तकेकिमनसि प्रेमोद्यते चेतसि काले यासि कथं च रुढवयसि प्रौढां प्रियां मुञ्चसि ॥

In the season when the waters overflow, the sky is overcast, the rays of the sun are obscured, the streams are in flood, the speed of wayfarers is checked, and flashes of lightning abound in such a season, the resort of the god of love, when the peacocks' hearts are maddened, and thy own heart is eager for love, how canst thou leave thy youthful wife and go on thy travels, young as thou art! (3. 389).

उत्कृञ्चिच्छिन नटकरदिनं प्रादुर्भवंच्छाखिन क्रीडन्नेककुल पतद्गुहजलं क्षुभ्यद्भरित्रीतलम् ।

पुण्यत्काममदं जवजनपदं सोत्सर्गसिन्धुस्यदं दृष्ट्वेम मिहिर जगप्रियकरं काभ्येति न स्त्री नरम् ॥

What woman doth not approach her lover at the sight of the rainclouds, delightful to the world? Now the peacocks sing, the elephants dance, the trees flourish, the frogs make merry, heavy showers come, and the earth is astir, the frenzy of love grows apace, the countryside thrives in glory, and the current of rivers gains in force (3. 390)

The monsoon breezes are described in several verses

कुर्वाणाः प्रचलाकिनां कलरवैरुत्तालनृत्तक्रियां न्यस्यन्तो निचुलेषु कन्ददलोद्धासावकाशश्रियः ।

एते चातकपोतपेयलिपतस्याथःकणश्रेणयो बाता घान्ति निदावलङ्घनवनोद्धावाः प्रदीर्घागमाः ॥

Breezes blow, pervasive in their approach, and skilled in overcoming the summer heat. They dance wildly to the sweet notes of peacocks, and exhibit in Kadamba trees the beauty born of the rich array of shoots and leaves, and produce the raindrops the young Cātaka birds drink (3. 392).

स्फुटितकुटजराज्जिर्मल्लिकोद्धासहारी नवनिचुलविलासः कन्दलानन्दकारी ।

सरति वनसमीरः सीकरासारधारी कृतसमधिककान्तिः केतकीकाननानाम् ॥

A strong wind sweeps along, conveying sprays of water, and enhancing the beauty of the Ketakī groves It makes the rows of Kutaja trees burst into bloom, and destroys the gaiety of Mallikā blossoms, and makes the young Kadamba trees gay, and brings joy to Kandala flowers (3 393).

मोत्तालयन् करटिना करपुष्कराणि रन्ध्रोदुरध्वनितकीचकाननान्त ।

उद्गापयन् मधुकरीर्नवनीपलम्ना वातः प्रवाति शिखिताण्डवपूर्वरङ्ग ॥

The wind blows, a prelude to the dance of peacocks, making the bees, seated on the fresh Kadamba blossoms, sing It quickens the movements of the fore-ends of elephants' trunks, and makes the interior of the bamboo groves echo with loud sounds coming through the holes (3 394)

The pleasures of the rainy season are recounted again

रामा कामप्रकामा सुकविकृतिकथादोहदा वाग्विवादा सौधोत्सङ्गाः सभोगास्तरुणतरुदोल्लासकान्ता दिगन्ता ।

यस्मिंश्चासारवारिस्त्रवदनगुणक्रेणिसारा समीरा सोऽय मोदाय राजन्न भवति समय कस्य पर्जन्यजन्यः ॥

Sire, who is not delighted by this season of rainclouds ? Now the women burst with passion, literary quarrels take place centering round topics in the works of worthy poets, the palaces are equipped with the joys of life, the regions of the sky look charming with the gay beauty of the young leaves of trees, and the breezes are laden with thick sprays of water issuing from heavy showers (3.401)

The plight of the animals in the deepening gloom of the rainy season with its floods and storms is touchingly described

अम्भश्चण्डसमीरणाश्रयशिवाफेत्कारताम्यन्मृगे काले सूचिमुखाग्रमेघतिमिरप्राय क्षपासङ्घिनि ॥

सौदामनीघुतिकरालितसर्वेदिके कं देशमाश्रयतु डिम्भवती कुरङ्गी ॥

The elephants are frightened by showers of ever falling rough hailstones hurled by the clouds The waters of the rivers heave with the trees on the banks swept away by the current The deer languish as the jackals howl on account of violent rainstorms. In such a season when the nights are dark as pitch, where will the hind take shelter with her young ? Now, the mountain peaks are hurled down by heavy floods, the lion cubs are frightened by the rumble of the rainclouds, and the regions of the sky made lurid by flashes of lightning (1 65-6)

Winter scenery and the joys of the season are described in the following verses

भास्वन्मन्दिनि वातवाहिनि हिमासारावसन्नादिनि काले कामिनि दीर्घरात्रिघटिनि प्राटेत् कृती कोऽध्वनिः ॥

यत्रैतत् स्वयमेव कामिषु निशि स्त्रीणां घनालिङ्गनं यत्राय सरकेलिकामितसमायामस्त्रियामागम ।

यत्रार्द्रार्द्रिककालिभि परिचितः सद्यःसुतोऽसौ रस प्रीत्यै कस्य न स क्षितीश्वरपते प्रालेयकाक्योऽनुवा ॥

Beloved, what wise man would take the road in the season that prolongs the nights? It lessens the heat of the sun and lets loose winds, and the creatures are benumbed by snowstorms. This is the season that ripens the sugarcanes, and looks beautiful with the corn, and makes Śephālīkā flowers abundantly bloom, maddens Krauñca birds, cheers up Kunda blossoms, and causes women to tighten their embrace (3 431) O lord of kings, who doth not delight in the winter now? In this season the women tightly embrace their lovers of their own accord at night, and the nights are long, like the cherished joys of the sports of love Now is also served fresh sugarcane juice flavoured with slices of raw ginger (3 435).

यैर्नीताः सौधमध्ये घनघुसुगरसालिसगात्रैः प्रकाम कान्तावक्षोजकुञ्जार्जनविजयिभुजैर्दीर्घयामास्त्रियामाः ।

विध्यातासन्नवद्विप्रसरितभसितापाण्डवः पिण्डशेषास्ते हेमन्ते नयन्ते तव नृप रिपव शर्वरीं पर्वतेषु ॥

Lean and emaciated, thy enemies, o king, pass the winter nights on the mountains, their bodies whitened by the spreading ashes of the fires dying out near them Once did they pass the long nights in their palaces, their bodies profusely smeared with thick saffron paint, with the hands gaily placed in the bower of the bosoms of their beloved ! (3. 433).

The poet is fond of dilating on the severity of the winter cold and its benumbing effect on men and animals, and sets before our eyes a series of vivid little frosty scenes

सिंहः संनिहितेऽपि सीदति गजे शीर्यत्कमस्पन्दनो मध्याह्नेऽपि न जातशष्पकचलः प्रायः कुरङ्गीपतिः ।

वत्सः कुण्ठितकण्ठनालवलनः पातुं न शक्तः स्तन वक्त्रं नैति विभातकर्मकरणे पाणिर्द्विजानामपि ॥

पृष्णानामधरान्तराललुलितस्तिष्ठन्ति पाथःकणाः पूर्वोत्खातविशुष्कपद्मवलगतः पोत्री च मुस्तशानः ॥

The lion sits idle, unable to move his feet, albeit the elephant is just near him. The antelope, as a rule, doth not take his mouthful of tender grass even at noon. The calf, with its neck inert, is unable to suck its mother's teat. Even the Brāhmanas are loth to apply the hands to the mouth while performing the morning rites (1. 54) The female swan feels great pain when a piece of lotus-stalk is put in her mouth (by her mate). The she-elephant languishes, resting the trunk on the ground, with her full breasts benumbed with cold. The Śābara woman, taking some fruit juice in her hands, piteously weeps when she sees in the winter morning the inert face of her child (1. 56). Even at noon the elephants drink only wave-splashed water from the banks of rivers. Even though the lion is athirst, water doth not come down his throat from the tip of the tongue. Drops of water remain rolling between the lips of antelopes. The boar resorts to the dry pond previously dug up, and feeds on Musta grass there (1.57).

The love life of animals in the spring is described in the following verse :

हंसो यत्र मृणालीनीकिसलयैर्गण्डूषतोयैर्गजः कोकश्चुम्बनचेष्टितैः परिपतन् पारापतः कृजितैः ।

एणः शृङ्गाविधर्षणैर्मृगपतिर्गाढ पुनः श्लेषणैः शृङ्गारप्रसरप्रसादिहृदयः स्वा स्वा प्रियां सेवते ॥

In springtime the animals, their hearts gladdened by the surge of love, caress their mates, each his own, the swan with offerings of tender leaves of water-lilies, and the elephant with mouthfuls of water, the red goose with strenuous kissings, and the flying dove with cooings, the antelope with gentle scratchings with the horns, and the lion with close embraces ever and anon (3. 442)

Geographical names are sometimes used to add a zest to natural descriptions.

आमन्दं पल्लवीनां रतिरभसभरप्राप्तकेलीविनोदाः सामोदं केरलीना मुखकमलवनामोदपानप्रगल्भाः ।

आश्रयं कुन्तलीनां कुचकलशरसावासकाराः समीराः काले वान्ति स तस्मिन् किल मलयलतानर्तिनो दक्षिणाव्याः ॥

The breezes of the south, which make the creepers on the Malaya mountain dance, blew at the time, soft, fragrant and cool. Verily these breezes delight in the vehement gaiety of love, in which the Pallava women indulge; avidly imbibe the fragrance of the lotus mouths of the women of Kerala, and linger on the perspiration on the high bosoms of the women of Kuntala (2. 69).

Morning scenery is described in 3. 3-22, and moonrise in 3. 479-489.

उत्कलोलो जलधिरजडं नीलनीरेजमेतन्मारः स्फारः प्रमदहृदयोदारचाराश्चकोराः ।

सौधोत्सङ्गाः सपदि विहितक्षीरपूराभिषङ्गा यस्मिन्नासे स जयति जनानन्दनञ्चन्द्र एषः ॥

वृद्धिर्वर्धेर्विजयसमयः पुष्पकोदण्डपाणे. क्रीडानीडं रतिरसविधेः प्राणित पद्ममयः ।

स्त्रीणां लीलावगमनिगम कामिनां केलिहेतुः स्रोत सूतिर्निजमणिभुवां देव चन्द्रोदयोऽयम् ॥

Yonder Moon thrives in glory, causing delight to men. When he joyously rises, the ocean surges with waves; the blue lotus comes to life, the god of love waxes strong, the Cakora birds move freely about with delighted hearts, and the surface of palaces is forthwith flooded with milk! (3. 481). Sire, this moonrise causes the ocean to swell. It is the hour of the flowerbowed Cupid's triumph. It is the pleasure resort of the sentiment of love and the life-breath of the fifth note of the gamut. It is the science that teaches women their graceful movements; the occasion for the sports of lovers, and the source of the oozing of moonstones (3. 484).

Descriptions of mountains and the Siprā river occur in Book. V. The following verse is addressed to an ancient tree:

पान्थैः पल्लवलुण्टनं करदिभिः स्कन्धस्य संघट्टनं संबाधो हरिभिः शकुन्तलिकरैः क्षोदस्तु किं वण्यते ।

किं चान्यत्तव देवदेहसदृशसौ लोक्यमान्यस्थितेरात्मीया इव यस्य याचकजनैः स्वच्छन्दसेव्याः श्रियः ॥

Travellers pluck thy leaves, elephants shake thy trunk, monkeys harass thee; and how can the pecking by bevvies of birds be described? What else can be said' Divine and universally honoured as thou art, thy riches can be enjoyed at will by suppliants as if they were all their own' (Book V, p 177)

Apart from the glimpses of animal life in the account of the seasons a considerable number of verses is devoted to the description of animals in our work. Verses in praise of horses and elephants are recited by the bards on the occasion of the presentation of the royal horse and the royal elephant to Yasodhara on the eve of his coronation. Elephants receive the first tribute of praise (2. 167-190) For example,

भयेषु दुर्गाणि जलेषु सेतवो गृहाणि मार्गेषु रणेषु राक्षसाः ।

मन प्रसादेषु विनोदवेधसो गजा इवान्यत् किमिहास्ति बाहनम् ॥ 2. 176.

Another series of verses is recited by the keepers on the occasion of the sports of elephants witnessed by Yaśodhara (3. 291-318). The poet often succeeds in presenting a life-like picture of the animal.

उच्चमीकृतकर्णतालयुगलं प्रत्यस्तपांसुक्रियं प्रत्यादिष्टकरेणुकेलिरमणं प्रत्यर्पितामभोघटः ।

पातु प्रार्थनया विराय विधृतानिक्षुर्गृहीत्वा करे तिष्ठत्यन्यकरीन्द्रसंचरमनाः कोपव्यथाकीलितः ॥

The elephant stands, holding in his trunk the sugarcane ere long seized at the instance of the keeper. He is rooted to the ground by the frenzy of wrath, his mind fixed on a rival, and the flat ears stand firm and erect. He hath given up playing with dust and renounced the joy of sports with his mate and repelled the pot of water set before him (3. 293).

Horses receive their share of praise in 2. 191-208. For example,

कदनकन्दुककेलिविलासिनं परबलस्वलने परिघा हयाः ।

सकलभूवलयेक्षणदृष्टयः समरकालमनोरथसिद्धयः ॥

Perhaps more interesting are certain individual verses on other animals. A simple yet faithful description of a dog occurs in Book V.

निर्मासास्य कपिलनयनं स्वल्पतीक्ष्णाग्रकर्णं कुक्षिक्षामः पृथुलजघनं पूर्णवक्षःप्रदेशः ।

दुग्धक्षिग्धप्रवतुदशनं सारमेयो महीशामाखेदाय प्रजवचरणं किञ्चिदाशुमवालः ॥

The same Book contains the following vivid picture of a huge buffalo.

रक्तमान्त्रविलोललोचनयुगं प्रोथप्रतिष्ठाननं प्रोत्कृणाग्रविषाणभीषणवपुर्नीलाञ्जनादिप्रभः ।

उत्कर्णं पृथुलकन्धरो गुरुसुरः स्थूलत्रिकोरस्थलः सा मृत्वा कमनीयचालधिरभूच्छागी पुनः कासरः ॥

The she-goat, after death, was reborn as a buffalo with a fine hairy tail. His eyes were nimble and fringed with red, and the mouth firmly based on the snout. He resembled a mountain of blue collyrium with a body made fierce by the horns curved at the extremities. He had erect ears, broad shoulders, massive hooves, and fleshy breast and buttocks (Book V, p. 224).

Epitaphs on animals do not seem to occur in Kāvya poetry, and the following mournful verses on a favourite peacock and a dog, uttered by the king on their death, belong to a type rare in Sanskrit literature ¹

प्रासादमण्डनमणौ रमणीविनोदे क्रीडावनीधरशिलातलचित्रलेखे ।

को नाम केलिकरतालविधि वधूना नृत्तानुगं त्वयि करिष्यति कीर्तिशेखे ॥

(Addressed to the peacock). 'Thou wast the oramental gem of the palace and the joy of the ladies, and gleamed like a picture on the rocks of the pleasure hill. Who will dance to the joyous clapping of hands by the damsels, since thou art dead?'

सिंह. सुखं निवसतादचलोपकण्ठे सोऽकण्ठमेगनिचयञ्चरतात् स्थलीषु ।

सत्त्वा. परेऽपि विपिने विलसन्वशङ्कं नाकं गतोऽयमधुना ननु विद्वद्वदु ॥

Verily this dog is gone to heaven. Let the lion now live happily on the mountain slope. Let the deer graze on the fields with zest. Let other animals, too, move about freely in the woods without fear (Book V, p. 192).

The commotion of the animals in the Sīprā river, caused by the inroad of an army of fishermen, equipped with boats, nets and spears, is graphically described in the following verse

उड्डीनाण्डजडिभमाकुलभवञ्चालीकिनीकाननं कूलोत्तालबिलान्तरालचलनग्लानालगर्दभिकम् ।

प्राय.पङ्क्तिगतगर्वरमिलदौलेयबालं मुहुस्तत्त्वोत् कलुषीवभूव विवशग्राह विगाहत्तव ॥

Then the rolling waters of the river became turbid ever more, with the alligators lying helpless. The young birds flew about, and the waterlilies swayed to and fro. The young water-snakes, briskly moving about on the bank, languished after running into the holes. The young turtles mingled with the buffaloes in the muddy hollows (Book V, p. 217).

III THE CREMATION-GROUND

One of the most elaborate and comprehensive descriptions in Yaśastilaka is that of the cremation-ground in the opening chapter, in which the sterner aspects of Nature are brought into play, and the entire description is of a kind not fully met with in Kāvya literature. The reader is at once reminded of the picture of the cremation-ground in Mālatīmādhava, but the aim of Bhavabhūti is to evoke horror, while that of Somadeva is to excite pity, and the verses are appropriately put in the mouth of the Jaina sage Sudatta¹ The delineation of the horrid scene is followed by the thoughts provoked by the sight of the decomposing corpse of a young woman, and specially by the contrast between her former beauty and present condition. The decaying body is described limb by limb; and while the description of the scene of desolation shows graphic power, that of the dead woman is overdone, and lapses into wearisome details, although there are some beautiful verses which recount her former charms. Some of the verses in which the cremation-ground is described are cited below.

1 Cf the commemorative inscription mentioned in Chapter V, p. 123. It has been pointed out that the preface to the Histories of Orosius (417-18 A. D.) 'has a charm of its own, for it is one of the few places in ancient literature where dogs are mentioned with feeling'. In early Greek poetry we have the epitaph of Simonides on the hound Lycas whose white bones lying in the tomb are still a terror to the wild beasts. The poet refers to the mountain landscape in which the hound ran while alive. "Thy worth is well-known to tall Pelion and far-seen Ossa and the lonely peaks of Cithaeron." Fragment 142, Diehl Anthologia Lyrica V, p. 113.

इयेनकुलं घृककुलं द्रोणकुलं शकुलभण्डनाद्गीतम् । शवपिशितप्राशवशादिवि भुवि च समाकुलं पुरतः ॥

The place is overrun by dogs eager to devour the fragments of half-burnt bodies. They are busy fighting and loudly bark and indulge in a pastime delightful to the god of death. And in the foreground, flocks of hawks, owls and ravens, scared away by the fighting of the dogs, throng in disorder on the earth and in the sky in the hope of feeding on the flesh of the corpses (1. 13-4).

गृध्राप्रातसमांसकीकरसन्नाबोत्पथा. पादपाः प्रेतोत्पान्तपतत्पतन्निपरूपप्रायाः प्रदेशा दिशः ।

एते च प्रबलानिलाश्रयवशाच्छीर्यच्छिस्ताः सर्वतः संसर्पन्ति जरत्कपोतरुचयो धूमाश्रिताचक्रजाः ॥

The trees are polluted by the oozings from the fleshy bones swallowed by the vultures, and the topmost branches are blown away by violent gales. The environs are made repulsive by the birds flocking round the dead, and on every side spreads the smoke of funeral pyres, resembling in colour age-worn doves (1. 85).

कालासिद्धनिटिलेक्षणदुर्निरीक्षा. कीनाशहोमहुतबाहविरुक्षवीक्षाः ।

बाहद्ववच्छवपुःस्फुटदस्थिमध्यप्रारब्धशब्दकठिना दहनाश्रितानाम् ॥

The flames of the funeral pyres are hard to look at, like the eye on Śiva's forehead at the time of the universal fire of destruction, and present a gruesome sight, like a ceremonial fire in which oblations are offered to the god of death. They are harshly loud with the sound produced within the cracking bones of the dead bodies dissolved by the fire (1. 86).

अद्भ्यश्चरीरशवशीर्णशिरोजसारः कुप्यत्कलेवरकरङ्कहतप्रचारः ।

दग्धार्चदेहमृतकामिमयप्रबन्धो वातः करोति ककुभोऽशुभगन्धबन्धाः ॥

The wind fills the regions of the sky with a noxious smell. It is laden with the falling hair of decomposing dead bodies, and checked in its onrush by the skeletons of putrid corpses, and fans the flames clinging to the halfburnt bodies of the dead (1. 88).

यान्युत्सवेषु कृतिनां कृतमङ्गलानि वाधानि मोदिजनगेयनिरङ्गलानि ।
तान्येव शोकवशबन्धुरवोद्धुराणि नर्दन्ति संस्थितवतां विरसस्तराणि ॥

Those very musical instruments, which on festive occasions accompany, unimpeded, the songs of joyous crowds, and prove auspicious to the lucky, sound harsh when they mourn the dead, loud as they are with the wailings of kinsmen stricken with grief (1. 89)

दन्तोत्कीलितशुष्ककीकसकलाकीलोद्भलतालुकाः कण्ठान्तःप्रविलम्बशब्दशकलोद्भालस्वलकुक्षयः ।

प्रेतप्रान्तपुराणपादपतपत्रप्रदुष्यदृश प्रभ्रान्यन्यविशङ्कफेत्कृतिक्षीबाः शिवाः सोढवाः ॥

The jackals roam about, full of joy and maddened by their own fearless howls. Their palates are pierced by the nail-like fragments of the dry bones stuck fast in the jaws, and their bellies quiver as they spit out pieces of bones sticking in the throat, while their eyes are troubled by the leaves falling from the age-worn trees alongside of the corpses (1. 94).

Sudatta then gives vent to his feelings at the sight of the dead body of the woman, apparently a courtesan

This lock of hair used to adorn her cheeks and looked like a fly-whisk during the sports of love and beautifully gleamed like bees clinging to lotus ear-ornaments. Driven along by the wind and grey with dust, it now does the work of a moving broom in the cremation-ground! (1. 95).

The cheek that was gaily embellished with ornamental designs of musk paint, and gleamed like the moon, is now pecked by young crows, and looks like a gourd lacerated by disease! (1. 99)

या कौमुदीव सरसीव मृणालिनीव लक्ष्मीरिव प्रियसखीव विलासिनीव ।

तैस्तैर्गुणैरजनि सा सुतनु प्रजाता प्रेतावनीवनवशा विवशा वराकी ॥

By dint of manifold merits, the fair maid was like the light of the moon, like a pool of water, like a water-lily, like the goddess of wealth, like a beloved friend, like an elegant lady. She is now wretched and forlorn, lying helpless in the wilderness of the cremation-ground (1. 113).

यामन्तरेण जगतो विफलाः प्रयासा यामन्तरेण भवनानि वनोपमानि ।

यामन्तरेण हतसंगति जीवितं च तस्याः प्रपश्यत जना क्षणमेकमङ्गम् ॥

आश्लिष्ट परिशुम्बित परमित यद्गारोमाश्लितैस्संसारसुखास्पदं वपुरभूदेवंदशागोचरम् ।

शीर्यच्चर्मचयं पतत्पलभरं भ्रष्टयच्छिरापञ्जरं व्यस्यत्संधिबलं गलन्नलकुलं कुथ्यत्सजाजालकम् ॥

Without her, the toil of the world seems to be in vain. Without her, the houses look like the woods. Without her, life loses its meaning.

Ye folks, behold her body for a moment The source of mundane joys her body used to be clasped, kissed and enjoyed by men thrilled with passion
But it is now reduced to such a plight The skin is torn to shreds, the flesh is falling off, and the network of veins is loosening The strength of the joints is gone, the bones are crumbling to pieces, and the sinews are putrescent (1 121-122)

With the above pictures may be compared that of Amrtamati, stricken with a fell disease after her crime. Somadeva depicts the gruesome to excite our pity

अलिकुलमिदं लुतातन्तुप्रतानविधूसरं मनसिजधनुर्जातं जीर्यतनुस्थिति पिञ्जनम् ।

कुवलयवन धत्ते दैन्य द्वाग्निसमाश्रयं घुणदरभरभ्रस्यस्तम्भप्रभावमभूद्वपु ॥

The hair, once dark as a swarm of bees, has turned grey as the threads of a cobweb The eyebrows, once like Cupid's bow, resemble a dilapidated bow for cleansing cotton The eyes, once blue lotus blossoms, look miserable, as if within grasp of a forest fire, and the body resembles a worm-eaten pillar, about to crumble¹ (Book V, p. 223).

IV OTHER DESCRIPTIONS

Somadeva's power of portraying the terrible is illustrated in the picture of Candamāī, which looms large in the opening chapter of the work.
Sound echoes the sense in the powerful description of the goddess in 1 137.

उत्सर्पद्वर्षसर्पाकुलविकटजटाजूटविभ्यद्विधूनि प्रान्तप्रेङ्खत्कपालावलिचलनरगद्वण्टखट्टाङ्गकानि ।

दैत्यध्वंसप्रमोदोद्गुरविधुतकराभोगखर्वद्विरीणि स्फाराघाताङ्घ्रिपातोच्छलदुदधिजलान्युद्धतोद्वेहितानि ॥

The impetuous movements of the goddess are such that the waters of the ocean are splashed by the heavy impact of her feet; and the moon (on her forehead) is terrified by the horrid mass of her matted hair, entwined with madly excited serpents, while the bells of her club ring out as the human skulls, swaying at her side, move to and fro, and the mountains are laid low by her massive hands as she vehemently waves them in an outburst of joy at the destruction of the demons.

Among other descriptions may be mentioned those of the city of Ujjayinī (2 14-29) and of king Yaśorigha (2 31-53). There is a good description of child life in 2 82-90, which testifies to Somadeva's accurate observation and love of children, and is all the more interesting, as such descriptions are by no means common in Kāvya literature

अम्बां तात इति ब्रवीति पितरं चाम्बेति संभाषते धात्रीपूर्वनिवेदितानि च पदान्यर्धोक्तितो जह्यति ।

शिक्षालापविधौ प्रकुप्यति धृतो नास्ते स्थितोऽयं क्वचिद् व्यावृत्तो न ज्ञानेति जह्यति -- सत्वरम् ॥

1 But - pillar crumbling owing to the accumulation of worm holes.

The child addresses the mother as 'daddy' and the father as 'mammy'. He half utters the words first taught by the nurse. He becomes angry when an effort is made to teach him, and nowhere keeps still when held. He never listens when summoned. He slips and rises quickly and runs again (2 90).

तद्रेह वनमेव यत्र शिशवः खेलन्ति न प्राङ्गणे तेषां जन्म वृथैव लोचनपथं याता न येषां सुता ।
तेषामङ्गविलेपनं च नृपते पङ्कोपदेहैः समं येषां धूलिविधूरामजरजश्चर्चा न वक्षःस्थले ॥

Verily the house where no children play in the courtyard is a jungle. Futile is their birth who have seen no children of their own. Beauty-paint, o king, is like a smearing of mud for those whose bosoms are not bedaubed with the dust transmitted by their children, grey with dust (2 88)

Descriptions of female beauty, so common in Kāvya poetry, are few and far between in Yasastilaka owing to the very nature of the plot. We may here cite two of the verses spoken by Vārisena, unable to forget his young wife even after he has renounced the world.

अलकवलयरम्यं भूलतानतैकान्तं नवनयनविलासचारुगण्डस्थलं च ।
मधुरवचनगर्भं स्नेहविम्बाधराया पुरत इव समास्ते तन्मुख मे प्रियाया ।
लीलाविलासविलसन्नयनोत्पलाया स्फारस्मरोत्तरलिताधरपल्लवाया ।
उत्तुङ्गपीवरपयोधरमण्डलायास्तस्या मया सह कदा ननु संगमः स्यात् ॥

The watersports of young women in the Siplā river are described in the following verse in Book V.

अश्रयत्कर्णवतसकाः सरलितप्रान्तप्रलम्बालका शीर्यत्कजललोचनाः परिगलद्गण्डस्थलीचन्दनाः ।
उत्कम्पस्तनमण्डलाः प्रविलसल्लीलाब्जबाहाकुलाः क्रीडन्ति सः पुराङ्गनाः प्रियतमैरासेव्यमाना इव ॥

A graceful picture of women adorned with floral decorations occurs in the description of the summer in Book III.

विकचविकचिकिलीकीर्णलोलालकानां कुरबकमुकुलस्रक्तरहारस्तनीनाम् ।
दरजरठदलाग्रैः पल्लवैश्चूतजातैर्नृप किमपि कषायं चोषिताः चुम्बन् वक्षन् ॥

Kiss, o king, the mouths of women redolent with mango shoots with slightly hardening tips. The agile curls of their hair are studded with fullblown Vicakila blossoms, and wreaths of Kurabaka buds and radiant pearlstrings adorn their bosoms (3. 379).

A number of playful verses occurs in connection with the description of moonrise on the subject of the conventional viraha of young women such as are frequently found in the Mahākāvyas, and it is interesting to find that the Jaina monk proves himself an adept in dealing with such topics. The following verses contain what is known as dūtivākya, but are attributed in our work, as in so many other cases, to bards attached to Yaśodhara's court.

ग्रीष्मस्थलानिलमितं श्रुतं नितान्तमुद्यानसारिणिसमस्तुतिरश्रुपूरं ।
आनर्तितस्तनतटास्तव कान्तं कोपात्कण्ठे च मास्तलवाः सरवाः प्रियायाः ॥

The sighs of thy beloved, o lover, are utterly like desert winds; her tears flow like a garden rivulet, and owing to her wrath her sobs are loud and shake the bosom (3 496)

आतस्वद्विरहेण सज्जरभरादस्या सर संगमे पाथ काथविधेर्यदद्भुतमभूदेतत्तदाकर्ण्यताम् ।

उड्डीन मुहुर्गण्डजैस्त्रिमिकुलैस्तीरे स्थित दूरत शीर्णं शैवल्लिमञ्जरीभिरभित. क्षीण क्षणाचाम्बुजैः ॥

Listen, o brother, to the miracle of how the waters boiled when she entered the waters of the pool, suffering from grievous heat owing to her separation from thee! The birds flew off again and again, the fish kept to the shore at a distance, the offshoots of the moss were torn to shreds all around, and the lotus blossoms withered in a moment! (3 497)

तव सुभग वियोगात् पञ्चपैरप्यहोभिर्मनसिजशरदीर्घा श्वासधारा सुदत्या ।

स्वरविजयपताकास्पर्धिनी वक्रकान्तिस्तनुरतनुधनुर्ज्यातानव चातनोति ॥

Beautiful lover, in less than a week, owing to her separation from thee, the fair maid's sighs lengthened like Cupid's arrows, the complexion turned white as Cupid's triumphal banner, and the body became lean as Cupid's bowstring! (3. 498)

केदं काश्यं क च मनसिजस्फारवाणप्रहार कायं ताप क च निरवधिर्बाष्पप्रचार. ।

कैषा मूर्च्छा क च कुचपटप्रेङ्खणश्वासकल्प कासौ लज्जा क च मृगदृशश्चित्रमेष प्रजल्प ॥

What a great contrast between the emaciation of the fair maid's body and the continuous hitting by Cupid's arrows! Between her heat and the unceasing flood of her tears! Between her swoon and the sighs that shake her robe! Between her bashfulness and the words uttered at random! Strange it is all! (3. 502)

बन्धुप्रार्थनतस्त्वयि स्मृतिनिशावेशात्तया मुग्धया दत्तश्रद्धुषि यावक कृतमिदं बिम्बाधरे कज्जलम् ।

कण्ठे काञ्चिगुणोऽर्पित परिहितो हारो नितम्बस्थले केयूर चरणे द्युत विरचित हस्तौ च हिङ्गीरकम् ॥

Begged by her friends (to decorate herself), the foolish girl, owing to the concentration of the night-like train of her thoughts on thee, applied red lac paint to the eyes and collyrium to the ruddy lips,¹ wore the girdle round the neck and the neck-lace on the hips, and fastened the bracelets to the feet and the anklets to the hands! (3 503)

कामस्यैतत्परमिह रहो यन्मनःप्रातिकूल्य तस्मादेष ज्वलति नितरामङ्गमाधुर्यहेतुः ।

कामं कान्तास्तदनु रसिका प्रीतये कस्य न स्युस्तत्रास्वादः क इव हि सखे या न पक्वा मृणाल्य ॥

Love's great secret it is on earth it blazes up on account of disappointment of hopes, lending grace to women's physical charms Fair women then become subject to intense passion, and who would not delight in them? 'What is their flavour like, o friend?' 'They are just tender water-lilies!' (3 506)

1 Red paint is applied to the lips and collyrium to the eyes

VI. DIDACTIC VERSES

As in other Kāvya works, didactic verses are interspersed in Yasastilaka, and occasionally contain balanced expression of the wisdom of life and bring into relief human traits with remarkable fidelity and insight. The specimens cited here are classified according to the subject dealt with by them.

THE GODDESS OF WEALTH

तातस्तावज्जडनिधिरभूत् सोदर. कालकूट कृष्णे यस्या प्रणयपरता पङ्कजाते रतिश्च ।

लक्ष्म्यास्तस्या सकलनृपतिस्त्रैरिणीवृत्तिभाज क प्रेमान्धो भवतु कृतधीर्लोकविष्ठाविकाया. ॥

What wise man will blindly fall in love with the subversive goddess of wealth, a harlot kept by all the kings? The Ocean ('the abode of waters', also 'the abode of folly') is her father, and the Kālākūta poison her brother. She loves Kṛṣṇa, the Black, and is fond of the mud-born lotus (2 160).¹

असल्लोकानुरोधेन सल्लोकोपेक्षणेन च । व्यालशैलान्तरालाङ्गी कुरङ्गीवाक्षमा रमा ॥

The goddess of wealth is helpless, like a hind placed between a wild elephant on one side and a mountain on the other, because she favours the wicked and neglects the good (3 177)

TRANSIENT CHARACTER OF LIFE AND ITS JOYS

मायासाम्राज्यवयां कविजनवचनस्पर्धिमाधुर्यधुर्यां स्वमासैश्वर्यशोभा कुहकनयमयारामरम्योत्तराभा ।

पर्जन्यागारसारास्त्रिदिवपतिधुर्बन्धुराश्च स्वभावादायुर्लावण्यलक्ष्म्यस्तदपि जगदिदं चित्रमत्रैव सक्तम् ॥

It is strange that the world is attached to life, beauty and wealth. They are but magnificent as a phantom empire, supremely sweet as the words of poets, beautiful as treasure obtained in dreams, charmingly resplendent like a magic garden, lovely as a mansion of clouds, and, by nature, delightful only as a rainbow (1. 124)

मायारामसमा रमा सुखमिदं दुःखावलेखोन्मुखं स्वमालोकनय सुहृत्परिचय कान्ता कृतान्ते हिता ।

उत्साहोऽपि च देहगेहविषयो य सोऽप्यनिलोदयस्तत्त्वालोकविलुप्तचित्तमसा पुसां भवेदुत्सवः ॥

Prosperity is like a magic garden, and pleasure is liable to be marred by pain Friendship is like the vision of a dream, and a beloved woman is but an aid to Death Even the zeal for the mansion of the body has merely transient results Joy is for those who have destroyed the darkness of their minds with the light of the Truth (Book V).

PROPER USE OF WEALTH

लब्धा अपि श्रियो यान्ति पुंसां भोक्तमजानताम् । अबद्धा कुञ्जरेन्द्राणां पुलाका इव हस्तगाः ॥

Riches, even though acquired by men who know not how to enjoy them, are lost for ever, like the loose grains of boiled rice seized by mighty elephants with their trunks (3 78)

1 The reference is to the legend of Lakṣmī emerging during the churning of the ocean. Jadandhr is purposely used for jalamandhr Kṛṣṇa stands for Viṣṇu, the consort of Lakṣmī Somadeva rarely uses such devices in his verse

THE CURSE OF DEPENDENCE

सत्त्वं दूरे विहरति सम साधुभावेन पुसा धर्मश्चित्तात् सह करुणया याति देशान्तराणि ।
पाप श्लापादिव च तनुते नीचवृत्तेन सार्धं सेवावृत्ते परमिह पर पातक नास्ति किञ्चित् ॥

सौजन्यमैत्रीकरुणामणीना व्यय न चेद्दृष्ट्यजन करोति ।

फल महीशादपि नैव तस्य यतोऽर्थमेवार्थनिमित्तमाहुः ॥

No greater sin is there on earth than earning one's livelihood by serving others Truth with honesty wanders far away from such men, and piety with compassion departs elsewhere from their hearts, while their sin increases with meanness, as if under a curse. Unless the servants of a king barter away the gems of courtesy, good will and kindness, they are never rewarded by him, for, as is said, money alone begets money¹ (1. 130-131).

THE USE OF POETS

राजन्नशेषविषयातिशयप्रसूतौ येषा महाकविकृतौ न मनीषितानि ।

तेषा श्रुती च रसना च मनश्च मन्ये वाग्देवताविहितशापमिवेश्वराणाम् ॥

Sine, Sarasvati's curse, I ween, is on the ears, tongues and minds of those kings, who evince no desire for the works of great poets, which create supreme beauty in an infinite range of themes (3. 275)

यथास्त्ररहिते पुंसि वृथा शौर्यपरिग्रहः । तथोपन्यासहीनस्य वृथा शास्त्रपरिग्रहः ॥

स्फुरन्त्यपि मनःसिन्धौ शास्त्ररत्नान्यनेकशः । वचोगुणविहीनानि भूषयन्ति न सन्मनः ॥

विद्याना स्फुरित प्रीत्यै स्त्रीणा लावण्यवद्बहिः । अन्तर्भवतु वा मा वा किं विचारैरतीन्द्रियैः ॥

The bravery of a person without weapons is useless; just so the mastery of the Śāstras is futile in the case of a person without eloquence. The gems of learning may flash in plenty in the ocean of one's mind, but, without eloquence, they can never edify the minds of the wise. Like the beauty of women, the outward manifestation of learning causes delight. The inner existence of either matters little What is the use of investigating things beyond the range of the senses² (3. 372-78)

FIVE GREAT SINS

स्वामिद्रोह स्त्रीवधो बालहिंसा विश्वस्ताना घातन लिङ्गभेदः ।

प्रायेणैतत्पञ्चकं पातकानां कुर्यात् सद्यः प्राणिनः प्राप्तुं खान् ॥

Hostility to one's master, killing a woman, injury to children, killing those who have been assured of safety, and divulcation of secrets. these five sins nearly always bring swift misery to sentient beings (Book V)

THE RAISON D'ÊTRE OF AHIMSA

यत्परत्र करोतीह सुखं वा दुःखमेव वा । वृद्धये धनवद्वत् स्वस्य तज्जायतेऽधिकम् ॥

1 The idea seems to be that unless the employees of a king bring him money by fair means or foul, they are never rewarded by him

The pleasure or pain which a man causes to others in this life is like money lent on interest. it becomes his in a greater measure (Book VII, section 24)

VALUE OF DIRECTING POWER

स्वयं विषमरूपोऽपि संघातः कार्यकृद्भवेत् । अधिष्ठातुः प्रयत्नेन यथा हस्तोऽसमाङ्गुलिः ॥

Like the hand which has unequal fingers, a combination of things, although composed of unequal elements, proves effective by dint of the master's effort (3. 120).

VALUE OF CO-OPERATION

असहायः समर्थोऽपि न जातु हितसिद्धये । वह्निर्वातविहीनो हि बुसस्यापि न दीपकः ॥

Even an able man can never do any good without the help of others Fire, without air, cannot burn even chaff (3. 228).

THE PROPER ATTITUDE TOWARDS ENEMIES

अनुनयत वदत मधुरं यत्कार्यं तदपि मानसे कुरुत । रौति कल हि मयूरः सविष च भजङ्गमं दशति ॥
मूर्ध्ना वहति लोकोऽयं यथा दग्धमिहेन्धनम् । अनुशील्य क्षयं नेयस्तथारातिर्महात्मना ॥
प्रायः सरलचित्तानां जायते विपदागमः । ऋजुर्याति यथा छेदं न वक्रः पादपस्तथा ॥

Conciliate thy enemy and speak to him sweet words, but at the same time carry out what thou hast planned in thy mind The peacock sings sweetly, but feeds on venomous serpents Just as fire-wood is carried by men on their heads in order to burn it, similarly, in the world, a high-spirited person should first conciliate an enemy and then destroy him It is, as a rule, straightforward people who fall into danger It is not possible to cut a crooked tree with the same ease as a straight one (Book IV)

VALUE OF REPORT

आत्मनि विवेकविकलः प्रसिद्धिमात्रेण रज्यते सकलः । कैरव इव कमलेऽपि हि न श्रीः पूज्यं तथाप्यङ्गम् ॥

Even if a fool is called wise by all, the wise concur therein. Even glass becomes jewel owing to the craftsman's skill. All men, lacking in discernment, like a thing, simply because it is reported to be good. The goddess of wealth abides neither in the day-lotus nor in the night-lotus; yet the day-lotus is honoured (because it is said to be her abode) (3. 181-82).

A SECRET OF SUCCESS

कार्यार्थिनो हि लोकस्य किमन्याचारचिन्तया । दुग्धार्थी कः पुमान्नाम गवाचारं विचारयेत् ॥

It is useless for people who seek to gain their ends to study the ways of others Who ever investigates the ways of cows in need of milk? (3. 231).

WHAT IS NOT PROFITABLE TO PHYSICIANS AND MINISTERS

यौ स्वास्थ्याय समीहेते व्याधितस्य नृपस्य च । स्वार्थसिद्धिनिरोद्धारौ धिगधिकं तौ वैद्यमन्त्रिणौ ॥

Fie, fie on the physician and the minister who strive for the health and well-being of a patient and a king respectively, since they thereby stand in the way of their own profit! (3 187).

THE RIGHT THING IN THE RIGHT PLACE

तेजस्तेजस्विनां स्थाने द्युत धृतिकर भवेत् । करा सूर्याश्मवद्भानो किं स्फुरन्ति हताश्मनि ॥

The might of the mighty produces happy results when exerted in the proper place The rays of the sun do not flash on gravel as they do on sunstones (3 178)

THE USE OF OPPORTUNITIES

अज्ञानभावादथवा प्रमादादुपेक्षणाद्वात्ययभाजि कार्ये । पुनः प्रयासो विफलः समस्तो गतोदके कः खलु सेतुबन्धः ॥

All one's efforts are useless, once an opportunity is lost owing to ignorance or error or negligence What is the use of a bridge after a flood has subsided? (Book IV)

ENDURANCE

मार्दवाधिकतर कलधौतं तापताडनसह च निसर्गात् । एवमेव वपुरुत्तमपुंसां संपदा च विपदां च सहिष्णु ॥

Gold is extremely soft, and yet, by nature, capable of bearing heat and pounding Likewise, the bodies of the ablest men are capable of enduring privation as well as ease (Book V)

CHARACTERISTICS OF YOUTH

यस्मिन् रजः प्रसरति स्वलितादिवोच्चैरान्ध्यादिव प्रबलता तमसश्चकास्ति ।

सत्त्व तिरोभवति भीतमिवाङ्गजाग्नेस्तद्यौवनं विनयः सज्जनसंगमेन ॥

In youth ill-fame spreads far and wide as if from sin, deep-rooted ignorance reigns as if from blindness, and patience vanishes as if frightened by Cupid's fire. Control thy youth by association with the good (2. 161).

A THIEF SUSPECTS ALL

आत्मनीव परत्रापि प्रायः संभावना जने । यदस्तेनादपि स्तेनः स्वदोषात् परिशङ्कते ॥

People, as a rule, suppose others to be just like themselves. A thief, on account of his own wickedness, suspects another, even though he is not a thief (3 121)

CONJUGAL FIDELITY IS RARE

सुरतरहस्यं पुंसां यदि भवति स्वासु देव योषासु । किमिति श्रीरतिमन्दो गोविन्दो बलवीर्यलोलः ॥

Sire, if the inmost erotic desires of men were confined to their own wives, why should Kṛṣṇa, averse to Lakṣmī's love, run after cowherd maids? (3 204)

ADVICE TO OTHERS

विचक्षणः किं तु परोपदेशे न स्वस्य कार्ये सकलोऽपि लोकः । नेत्रं हि दूरेऽपि निरीक्षमाणमात्मभावलोके त्वसमर्थमेव ॥

All men are expert in giving advice to others, but not in doing their allotted work. The eye can see even distant objects, but not itself (Book IV)

FATAL TEMPTATION

किं नास्ति पल सलिले येन तिमिः सादरो गलाहारे । प्रायेण हि देहभृतां तत्रासक्तिर्यतो मृत्यु ॥

Is there no other food in the waters that a fish eagerly swallows the bait? Creatures are, as a rule, attached to objects that cause their death (3 231)

FORCE OF ASSOCIATION

पूज्यमब्जं श्रियः सङ्गाज्ज्येष्ठायाश्च न कैरवम् । प्रायो जनेऽन्यसंसर्गाद्गुणिता दोषितापि च ॥

The day lotus is esteemed for its association with the goddess of wealth, but not the night lotus for its association with the goddess Jyesthā¹. Merit and blemish among men depend invariably upon the company they keep (3. 118)

संसर्गेण गुणा अपि भवन्ति दोषास्तदद्भुतं नैव । स्थितमधरे रमणीनाममृतं चेतासि कलुषयति ॥

It is not strange that even merits turn into blemishes owing to the force of association. The nectar that is in women's lips corrupts the hearts of men (1. 79).

REASON

ईर्ते युक्ति यदेवात्र तदेव परमार्थसत् । यद्भानुदीप्तिवत्तस्या पक्षपातोऽस्ति न क्वचित् ॥

Whatever in this world conforms to Reason is really true, for, like the rays of the sun, Reason is partial to none (Book VI, p 270).

VII ATTACKS ON WOMEN

Numerous attacks on women occur in Yasastilaka in prose and verse, and this is explained partly by the very nature of the plot and partly by the fact that such attacks are frequent in Jaina literature owing to the stress laid on asceticism and abstention from pleasures. Attacks in verse occur in works like Gunabhadra's Ātmānusāsana, Śubhacandī's Jñānārṇava, Amitagati's Subhāsitaratnasamdoha (both censure and praise), and in Hemacandra's commentary on his Yogaśāstra 2 105. A notable instance of such attacks in Jaina canonical literature is found in Tandula-Veyāliya, one of the Pannas, wherein women are decied in prose and verse. It should, however, be noted that the character of women is sometimes painted in dark colours in non-Jaina works as well, for example, in the Mahābhārata (Anuśāsanaparva, chap 38).

1 For Jyesthā see Chap XV

Specimens of Somadeva's deprecatory verses on women are cited below¹.

स्त्रीषु साक्षाद्विष दृष्टो न म^१द्वि मे मन । तद्दृष्ट एव लोको हि दृश्यते भस्मनां गतः ॥

Verily there is poison in the eyes of women, I ween, and not in the eyes of serpents. Men, indeed, are seen to be reduced to 'ashes' as soon as they are looked at by women (Book IV)

देवैर्मनुजैरथ राक्षसैर्वा निसर्गतो गूढतरप्रचारा । ईदृक्तया ज्ञानुमित्तया वा न शक्यते स्त्रीजनचित्तवृत्तिः ॥

Neither gods nor men nor demons are able to ascertain or fathom the naturally inscrutable working of a woman's mind Ibid

यथोच्छिखण्डा मण्डूक्यो लोकविप्लवहेतव । तथा स्त्रिय स्वभावेन भर्तृव्यसनतत्पराः ॥

Just as crested tadpoles bring calamity to men, similarly women, by nature, set themselves to cause disaster to their husbands Ibid.

The irresistible temptation offered by women and the bewildering effect of their charms are emphasized in the following verses

क्षीणस्तपोभिः क्षपित प्रवासैर्विध्यापित साधु समाधितोयैः ।

तथापि चित्र ज्वलति स्मराम्नि कान्ताजनापाङ्गविलोकनेन ॥

The fire of passion is weakened by austerities, attenuated by travelling, and effectively quenched by the waters of meditation. Yet, strange it is, it flares up at the sight of women's glances (1 72)

तावत्तपो वपुषि चेतसि तत्त्वचिन्ता काम हृषीकविषये परमं शमश्च ।

यावच्च पश्यति मुख मृगलोचनाना शृङ्गारवृत्तिभिरुदाहृतकामसूत्रम् ॥

The body undergoes austerities, and the mind meditates on the Truth, and perfect calm prevails over the senses, only so long as a man does not behold the visage of fair women, which, by its amorous play, illustrates the lessons of the science of love (1 73)

श्रोत्र श्रुतो हरति वीक्षणमीक्ष्यमाणश्चित्त स्मृतः कृतसमागतिरङ्गकानि ।

प्राणान् पुन प्रणयवान् वियुतो रति च लोके तथापि वनिताजन एव यत्नः ॥

Women, when heard of, deprive one of the faculty of hearing. Looked at, they deprive one of the power of seeing. Remembered, they captivate the mind, and embraced, they disable the limbs. When in love, they take away one's life, and when separated, they take away one's joy. Yet women are the goal of all efforts in the world (1. 74).

1 Somadeva's reasoned views on the subject present an entirely different picture. See Chap. V. Misogynistic traits appear also in other literatures of a bygone age, and have been inspired by different motives. In Italian Renaissance literature, for instance, 'the current abuse of women, in which Petrarch no less than Alberti and Boccaccio indulged, seems to have been a scholastic survival of the coarse and ignorant literature of the mediæval clergy'. Symonds Renaissance in Italy, Vol. IV, p. 184 (1937 ed.).

तावद्गुरवो गण्यास्तावत् स्वाध्यायधीरत चेत् । यावन्न मनसि वनितादृष्टिविष विशति पुरुषाणाम् ॥

Teachers are obeyed, and the mind is prone to study, only so long as the poison of women's glances does not enter into the hearts of men (1 76)

तावत् प्रवचनविषयस्तावत् परलोकचिन्तनोपाय । यावत्तत्तृणीविभ्रमहतहृदयो न प्रजायेत् ॥

The scriptures maintain their jurisdiction, and it is possible to ponder on the other world, only so long as a man's heart is not enthralled by a maiden's charms (1 7)

VIII METRES

No attempt is made here to analyse the metres used by Somadeva in his verses. He uses, as a rule, the ordinary metres employed in Kāvya poetry, and it will be sufficient to point out a few special features, the most notable of which is the adaptation of certain Piākrit metres to the requirements of Sanskrit poetry.

Duvaī or Dvīpadī is a Piākrit metre, of which each foot consists of one gana of six mātrās, five ganās of four mātrās, and one long syllable at the end, the second and sixth ganās may be gurumadhya (—) or sarvalaghu (—) The metre is frequently used in Apabhramśa poetry, and Somadeva employs it in several verses of Yasastilaka (1 167, 169, 3 9, 17, 18, 313, etc) For example,

पूर्वं सरसकरजरेखाकृतिरधरहृदिस्ततो रविस्तदनु च सुसृणपिण्डखण्डद्युतिरब्जचयच्छविस्ततः ।

It is certain that Somadeva is not the first writer to employ the Duvaī metre in Sanskrit verse. The following verse occurring in Dasabhakti, a collection of Jaina devotional compositions in Piākrit and Sanskrit, is, for instance, composed in the Duvaī metre, and the Sanskrit Bhaktis, it should be noted, are attributed to Pūjyapāda

जातिजरोरोगमरणातुरशोकसहस्रदीपिता दु सहनरकपतनसंस्तस्यियः प्रतिबुद्धचेतसः ।

The Dvīpadī or Duvaī, or Doai, as it is also called in the Prākṛta Paṅgala, is, properly speaking, a metre with two pādas, and appears as such in

Apabhramśa works, but the Piākiit example of Dvīpadī given in Hemacandra's Chandonusāsana contains four feet, and the combined definition and example of the metre in the Prākīta Paṅgala, although apparently given in two verses of two feet each (1 152, 153), is taken by some to represent one verse of four feet¹ Somadeva's Sanskrit verses in the Dvīpadī metre consist of four feet

Mayanāvayāna or Madanāvataīa² is another Piākiit metre used by Somadeva in a group of lyrical verses, in Book V, which describe the Karahāta country. Each foot of this metre consists of four ganās of five mātrās, as pointed out by Hemacandra in his Chandonusāsana, Chap. 4. Nandīādhyā in his *Gāthālakṣaṇa*³ calls the metre Camdānana. The verses in question are cited below (p. 162)

Piākiit metres are also used in the three lyrical panegyrics, two in honour of king Māradatta in Book I (verses 175-212) and one in honour of the Arhat in Book VIII, section 37, consisting of 28 verses. Somadeva's scheme consists of an opening verse or verses in Āryā metre which he calls Varna, one verse in Mātrā⁴ metre consisting of one line of 41 mātrās and

1 'इदं च वृत्तं द्विपादमेव न चतुष्पादं, उदाहरणानुरोधादिति केचित् । अन्ये तु यदीदं द्विपादमेव तर्हि लक्षणं पादचतुष्टयेन कथं कृतमिति इदं चतुष्पादमेव, न चोदाहरणविरोधस्तस्य चरणद्वयेनापि सम्भवात्' । See Comm. on verse 154 in — (B I)

2 It will be seen that each verse has four feet and each foot twenty mātrās. Somadeva seems to follow Apabhramśa models. The metre is known also as Kāminimohana and occurs in the Apabhramśa poem Samdesarāsaka (verses 82, 83, 85). For example, वयणं निमुणैवि नगनन्धनं वटिं मयउसरमुक्कं न हरिणि उत्तट्टिया । मुक्कं दीउन्ह नीमाम उससतिया, पडिय इय गाहं गियण-यणि वरमतिया ॥ 83. The metre is discussed by Bhayani in his Introduction to the poem, p. 53, Singh's Jain Series, Bombay 1945. Samdesarāsaka has been attributed to the twelfth century A. D.

3 Edited by Prof. Velankar in ABORI, Vol. XIV, pp. 1-38.

4 There are five feet, and Somadeva's scheme is 15+11+15+12+15. The Mātrā is an Apabhramśa metre and employed in Samdesarāsaka (verses 18, 19, 24, 25 etc). In Apabhramśa poetry a Mātrā verse is often followed by a Dohā, and the whole is called Raddā. The Prākīta Paṅgala describes seven varieties of Raddā, that is, another of 27, one or more verses with four feet of sixteen mātrās each, called by him Catuspadī, several verses in Paddhatikā or Pajjhatikā metre consisting of four feet of sixteen mātrās each, and each foot rhyming with the other and ending with a ja gana (—) or sometimes four laghus, and a concluding verse called Ghattā. It may be noted that the Pajjhatikā is a popular metre in Apabhramsa poetry. It is, for instance, the prevailing metre of Kanakandacarita of Kanakāmāla, while it has been pointed out that of the three hundred and fifty-four Kadavakas (verse-groups) in Dhanapāla's Bhavisayattakahā, almost all with the exception of about seventeen are either in Pajjhatikā or in Alilaha metre, which is really a variety of Pajjhatikā¹. As regards the Ghattā verse, in all narrative poems in Apabhramsa the concluding couplet of a Kadavaka is almost always called Ghattā. Pingala recognises a Ghattā metre of 62 mātrās (31+31), and Śrutasāgara says in his commentary on 1.212 that there are twenty-seven varieties of Ghattā, and it may consist of 60 mātrās and sometimes of 62 mātrās. Of the three Ghattās in our work, two (1.187 and 8.37) consist of 60 mātrās, and in each half the first two sections of 10 and 8 mātrās each have a caesura and rhyme with each other, so that each half of 30 mātrās corresponds to a pāda of the Caupaiā described and illustrated in Prākṛta Paṅgala (1.97 and 98). The remaining Ghattā (1.212) is a two-foot Dvīpadī with 28 mātrās (6+4+4+4+6) in each half². A reference to Apabhramsa poetry shows that a variety of metres may be used for the Ghattā verse.

As regards Somadeva's scheme of arrangement, it seems to be based on Prākṛit models. An arrangement similar to his is, for instance, of Mātrā, and the composition of some of these resembles that of Somadeva's verse. For instance, the scheme of the Cārusenī variety is 15+11+15+11+15, that of Bhadrā is 15+12+15+12+15, and that of Rājasenā is 15+12+15+11+15. Somadeva's scheme represents a slight variation of the Rājasenā variety in respect of the number of mātrās in the second and fourth pādas, the total number of mātrās (68) being the same. The following example of the metre is from Samdeśarāsaka (verse 25) कुसुह लोयण रुदइ दुक्कसुत, धम्मिहउमुक्कुमुह, विज्जमइ अरु अयु मोडइ । विरहानलि सतविअ, समइ दीह करसाह तोडइ ॥ This is followed by two lines of Dohā. The scheme followed here is 15+11+15+11+15 corresponding to the Cārusenī of Prākṛta Paṅgala. The Rājasenā scheme of 15+12+15+11+15 is also found in Samdeśarāsaka, as pointed out by Bhayani (op cit), p. 67. The Mātrā is believed to be a very old Apabhramsa metre, as it was known to Virahāṅka (Vṛttagāṭhisamuccaya, JBBRAS, 1929, p. 87) who describes four different varieties of it, Cārunetrī, Rāhusenī etc. See Velankar Apabhramsa Metres, Journal of the University of Bombay, November 1933, p. 50.

found at the beginning of Dhavala's Harivamsapurāṇa composed in Apabhramśa verse, as can be seen from the extracts from that work given in Hiralal's Catalogue of Sanskrit and Prākrit Manuscripts in C. P. and Berar (pp. 716 and 763). We have here a group of eulogistic verses beginning with a Vanni (i. e. Vainā I 188-90) followed by a Mātīā (I 191) and other verses (Catuspadī I 192, Paddhatikā I 193, 210-11) ending with a Ghattā (I, 212). One of the panegyrics addressed to Māradatta is reproduced below to illustrate the above scheme of arrangement followed by Somadeva. As we have already pointed out (see Chap I), there was a considerable output of Apabhramśa poetry in and before Somadeva's time, and he has clearly borrowed Apabhramśa metres and applied them to Sanskrit verse for the sake of novelty.

Among comparatively rare Sanskrit metres employed by Somadeva may be mentioned the Mattebhavikridita used in 2.229. The metre of the following verse (1. 127) is uncertain.

न दैन्यात् प्राणानां न च हृदयहरिणस्य रतये न दर्पादङ्गानां न च करणकरिणोऽस्य मदनात् ।
 विधावृत्तिः किं तु क्षवमदनचरितश्रुतविधेः परे हेतौ मुक्तेरिह मुनिषु न खलु स्थितिरियम् ॥

The verse is composed in a metre corresponding to the Kīdā metre described by Hemacandra in his Chandonusāsana, chap 2, but in that metre the 12th and 13th syllables are heavy, whereas they are light in Somadeva's verse.

IX ARDHASAMASYĀ AND NĀNDĪ VERSES

An interesting example of an Ardhāsamasyā verse, of which the first half is spoken by a court poet and the other half by the king, occurs in the description of sunrise in Book III.

अर्धश्लोकवि —

अरुणकिरणमध्ये विद्रुमस्तम्बविम्ब. क्षितिप किमिव शोभां भानुरुद्यन् विभर्ति ।

बुध युधि मम शत्रो शोणितापूरितायां प्रतरदुपरि कोपात् पादलं यद्गदास्यम् ॥ 3. 19

(The poet) “Sire, the Sun with its coral orb rises amid crimson rays. What is its lustre like?” (The king) “Wise one, it resembles my own face, red with fury, emerging above the battlefield overflowing with the foeman’s blood” Other examples of Ardhāsamasyā verses are found in later Kāvya literature. There is, for instance, a series of them in Narsadhacarita 4. 102-9 and in Utpieksāvallabha’s Bhūksātana Kāvya (Paddhati 9).

Nāndī verses are imitated in 3 122-124. As explained in the Nāṭyaśāstra 5 109 ff, Nāndī consists of one or more benedictory verses recited by the stage-manager before the commencement of a dramatic performance, and a Nāndī verse may contain eight or twelve padas or phrases (avāntara-vākyas, according to Abhinavagupta). In certain satirical verses on ministers of kings, attributed to a poet named Taruṇilīlāvilāsa, the evil ways of a minister are represented as a drama, and three appropriate Nāndī verses are added as a prelude.

X STYLE

As we have already remarked, Somadeva employs in his verse a simpler and more lucid style than in his prose, and his poetry is, on the whole, free from the intricate and involved ideas and expressions that characterise his prose. He tells us in one of the opening verses of his romance (1 27) that neither Vakrokti (ornate speech) nor Svabhāvokti (natural expression) alone pleases the wise who delight in a combination of both, and this may be taken as a fair description of the principle underlying his own poetical style. Yet it should be remembered that Somadeva liberally uses the resources of the Kāvya style, and his verses are sometimes marked by the complexities and conventionalism associated with that style.

A few examples will suffice to illustrate the artificial conceits occasionally employed by Somadeva. In 1 168 a king is told that his Fame, although it is an old eunuch, goes up to enjoy the stairy Heaven, after enjoying all the Regions of the sky ('fame' being neuter and 'heaven' and 'regions' feminine in Sanskrit)¹. The description of battle scenes in 3. 438 ff is full of far-fetched and exaggerated conceits, and the picture of 'the violent battle' in 3 436 is made unreal by the poet's anxiety to compare it to the rainy season. An instance of how an otherwise beautiful verse is spoilt by an artificial conceit is provided by the following description of a young woman, which ends by figuring her as an enclosure for capturing Cupid, the elephant (Book VII, section 31)

एषा स्मरद्विदबन्धनवारिवृत्ति किं खेचरी किममरी किमिय रतिर्वा ॥

Conceits like these are a common feature of the Kāvya style in its later phases, and it must be said to the credit of Somadeva that he often shows laudable restraint and discrimination in the use of the many artifices resorted to by the poets of his age.

Citrālamkāras are absent in our work, and even slesa or word-play, which adds to the intricacy of Somadeva's prose, is but rarely used in his verse, and only a few examples of it can be recorded. There is a pun on kharadanda in 3 430, and the expression sadāna has four meanings in 3 312. The epithets in the verse quoted below (1 174) are simultaneously applied to three different things dancing, dalliance with women and the royal court.

चञ्चत्कुन्तलचामरं कलरणत्काञ्चीलयाडम्बरं भ्रूभङ्गार्पितभावमूर्ध्वचरणन्यासासनानन्दितम् ।

खेलत्पाणिपताकमीक्षणपथानीताङ्गहारोत्सव नृत्यं च प्रमदारतं च नृपतिस्थानं च ते स्तान्मुदे ॥

Elaborate Rūpakas are sometimes met with, for example, in 3 380, 381, wherein the women companions of Yaśodhara in his summer sports are successively figured as 'lows of woodland groves' and 'pools of water'

अलककिसलयानां भ्रूलताश्लाघिनीनां नयनमधुलिहानां चारुगण्डस्थलीनाम् ।

कुचकुसुमचयानां श्रीव्रनश्रेणिकानामवनिषु कुरु केली किं नृपान्यैर्वनान्तै ॥

1 उपसृज्य यद्विशस्ते नपुंसकं वृद्धमपि यशः सर्वा । ब्रामुपभोक्तुं यातं तरलिततारा तदाश्चर्यम् ॥

लसदलकतरङ्गा कान्तनेत्रारविन्दा प्रचलभुजलतान्ताः पीनवक्षोजकोका ।

अतनुजघनकूलाश्चाह्लावण्यवारस्व नृप जलकेलि कुर्वता स्त्रीसरस्व ॥

A typical Rūpaka is jarā-rajahī, Old Age fancied as a laundress whitening the hair¹, reminding one of rajanī-rajahī in Naisadhacarita 22. 113.

A practical example of Samāsokti occurs in connection with the satire on ministers. We are told that certain wise people, being unable to express their sentiments regarding the ministers of a king openly, do so with the help of a Samāsokti.²

प्रतीक्षे जातास्य सुकृतसुलभ तद्दिनमह यतो यातारोऽमी प्रलयमहयश्चन्दनतरो ।

असीषां पापानामिह हि वसतामेष महिमा कदाप्येतच्छायामभिलषति यन्नाध्वगजन ॥ 3 168

‘With confidence I await the auspicious day when the serpents on the sandal tree will go to ruin. Thanks to those wicked creatures living on the tree, no wayfarer ever seeks its shade’

An important feature of Somadeva's style is the occasional but deliberate effort to attain lyrical effect and the occasional use of rhyme (2 220, 3.428 etc). He may be regarded to some extent as a precursor of the lyrical style which reached its full development in Jayadeva's Gītāgōvinda, of this there is interesting evidence in the use of Apabhramśa metres in the three lyrical panegyrics considered in Section VIII (see above). Rhyme is also used in isolated verses for lyrical effect (2 75, 76 226 etc). Repetition of the last letter in a series of epithets is sometimes practised to give a lyric tone to a verse भास्वद्भास्वति दाहवाहिमरुति ज्वालोद्वग्नाशाकृति etc.

उन्मार्गाभसि मेघमन्दनभसि च्छन्नांशुमत्तेजसि etc

इक्ष्वांसि सस्यशालिनि खरं शेफालिकोत्फुल्लिनि etc

Alliteration is freely used in many verses interspersed in the work, and the quick movement of such verses is invariably in keeping with their lyrical qualities. Good use of onomatopoeia is made in the following description of elephants (3 304)

तडत्तडिति बन्धन युटति कन्धरोल्लासने खणत्खणिति वल्लिका गलति विक्रमारम्भिणि ।

मडम्मडिति भज्यते तरुगण. कृताघट्टने खडत्खडिति वारणः पतति चात्र युद्धैषिणि ॥

2 तदुक्त कैश्चिद्विर्पाश्चिरेनदेव हृदयस्थमपि जिह्वास्थ कर्तुमतीन्द्र. समासोक्तिमिषेण ।’

CHAPTER VIII

PHILOSOPHICAL DOCTRINES

A considerable number of philosophical doctrines is mentioned and discussed by Somadeva in Yasastilaka. The first section (Kalpa) of Book VI is interesting as a summary of the theories of salvation propounded by different schools of thought, followed by critical remarks on the opinions recorded by the author. The section is called Samasta-samaya-siddhāntāva-bodhana, 'Elucidation of the doctrines of all the schools', and important as a collection of philosophical tenets current in the tenth century. Another set of opinions is recorded in Book V in the episode of Candakarma and Sudatta, in which the former and his companions give an exposition of the doctrines followed by them, while the latter criticizes and tries to refute all of them. If we add to these the various Jaina doctrines explained and discussed in Yasastilaka, it will not be an exaggeration to describe the work as serving the purpose of a veritable compendium of the philosophical speculations of the age. The principal doctrines summarized in the romance are here grouped together according to the system to which they belong.

VAIŚEŚIKA DOCTRINES

Somadeva refers to two classes of Vaiśeṣika thinkers the Tārkika Vaiśeṣikas and the Saiddhānta Vaiśeṣikas. The main difference between the two schools of Vaiśeṣika philosophy is that the Saiddhāntas were Śaivas or worshippers of Śiva¹ and laid stress on faith, while the Tārikikas were followers of the Vaiśeṣika system proper and laid stress on knowledge. The Saiddhāntas held that salvation is the outcome of faith as manifested in initiation into the cult revealed by the omniscient Śiva in his two aspects, corporeal and incorporeal². It may be mentioned in this connection that, according to Haribhadra's Saddarsanasamuccaya (vv 13,59), both the Naiyāyikas and Vaiśeṣikas were worshippers of Śiva. Gunaratna mentions in his commentary four sects among the followers of Śiva. Śaivas, Pāśupatas and two others, and adds that the Naiyāyikas were called Śaivas, while the Vaiśeṣikas were called Pāśupatas. There was, however, a distinct school of Pāśupatas with doctrines of their own, and these do not seem to have been

1 The Siddhāntas or the Śivasiddhāntas are the Śaiva scriptures, and the Śaivas were often called Saiddhāntikas, e. g. in the Gurgi inscription of Prabodhasiva (मधुमती धाम मैद्वान्तिकानाम्). See Chap. XIII for this inscription.

directly connected with the Vaiśeṣika system Somadeva himself, as we shall see, mentions their view of salvation separately

The Tāikika Vaiśeṣikas, who do not seem to have been Śaivas, held that salvation results solely from the knowledge of the categories based on an understanding of their similarities and dissimilarities, and the categories are Substance, Quality, Action, Generality, Particularity, Inherence and Non-existence¹ Strictly speaking, this is not an accurate presentation of the Vaiśeṣika view According to that system, salvation is the result of Dharma and knowledge of the categories is only a means to that end inasmuch as such knowledge produces Dharma, of which the essence is nivṛtti or renunciation, and this cannot be realised unless the nature of all objects, external and internal, is comprehended and the evils inherent in them grasped Besides, Dharma cannot bring about salvation unless it is supported by the will of God This is the interpretation of Śrīdhara in his *Nyāyakandali*² Udayana says in his Kiraṇāvalī that salvation results from the realisation of the ultimate truth, revealed by the continuous practice of Dharma or renunciation according to the principles laid down in the Veda and other sacred texts, the knowledge of the categories being a preliminary discipline³

It is interesting to note that Somadeva, like Śivāditya, the author of Saptapadārthī, definitely includes Abhāva or Negation among the categories It is wellknown that Kanāda recognised only six categories, but from about the tenth century onwards writers on the Vaiśeṣika system such as Śrīdhara and Udayana have emphasized the importance of Ābhāva,⁴ and others have given it its legitimate place among the categories

Somadeva attempts to define with precision the nature of salvation propounded by the Vaiśeṣika system He says that the followers of Kanāda hold salvation to be the absolute cessation of the nine attributes of the Soul, namely, knowledge, pleasure, pain, desire, aversion, effort, virtue, vice and

mental impressions¹ Somadeva illustrates this statement by quoting a verse which tells us that, according to the sage Kanāda, the nature of an emancipated being is the same as that of the soul, as it may be supposed to exist outside the body तदुक्तम्—

This is in conformity with what we know of the Vaiśeṣika conception of salvation, which is also described as a quiescent condition comparable to a fire that has burnt up its fuel² The actual number of the attributes of the soul given by Somadeva is immaterial, since the Bhāṣya of Praśastapāda enumerates as many as fourteen of them³ The vital point is the complete loss of attributes in the state of emancipation Śrīdhara says that salvation does not consist in eternal bliss but in the continued existence of the soul in its own pristine condition, divested of all specific attributes⁴ He meets the objection of Mandana that this kind of salvation is nothing but annihilation, by contending that the cessation of specific attributes does not amount to annihilation in the case of the eternal soul⁵ Nevertheless, the view that salvation consists in the eradication of specific attributes is rejected in philosophical texts of diverse schools, e g in Sāṃkhya-sūtras 5 75, Bhōjavṛtti on Yogasūtras 4 33 and Bhāsarvajña's *Nyāyasāra*⁶

Somadeva makes some statements criticizing the Vaiśeṣika views on salvation He criticizes the Saiddhānta Vaiśeṣikas by saying that faith alone cannot lead to salvation, the Udumbara fruit never becomes ripe on account of the faith of a hungry fellow Further, if Mantras or mystic texts brought about the purification of the Self, no one would undergo the hardship imposed by self-discipline Dikṣā or initiation, too, cannot bring about salvation, as it is seen that the worldly blemishes which existed before initiation persist even after the completion of the rite⁷ As regards the Tārikika Vaiśeṣikas, Somadeva criticizes their view that knowledge leads to salvation Knowledge, he says, helps one to comprehend things, but not to acquire them, the mere perception of water, for example, does not slake one's thirst¹

Somadeva offers some further criticism on the kind of salvation set forth by the Vaiśeṣikas. The purport of what he says is it may be readily admitted that there is no knowledge or bliss of a worldly character in salvation, but if it is assumed to be a condition in which knowledge is totally absent, what would be the character of the emancipated soul? There cannot be a soul without knowledge, just as there cannot be fire without heat.² The opinion of the Yoga system of Patañjali is cited to show that knowledge exists in the state of salvation. Somadeva argues that such beings as Sadāśiva or Īśvara cannot be held to be worldly entities since they are omniscient, and if they are not worldly entities, they must be held to be emancipated beings. Now, Patañjali tells us that Īśvara, who is untouched by worldly ties such as the Kleśas, Kaṁman and its effects, and impressions, possesses omniscience in an unlimited degree.³ The example of Śiva or Īśvara, emancipated yet omniscient, thus shows that knowledge can co-exist simultaneously with salvation. Somadeva reinforces his argument by quoting a verse from Avadhūta,⁴ addressed to Śiva, in which universal knowledge is attributed to the Exalted One, besides irresistible power, aversion to pleasure, contentment, self-control, supreme bliss and unimpeded energy. On these grounds Somadeva, like many other thinkers, rejects the Vaiśeṣika view of salvation as a colourless condition devoid of attributes.

BUDDHIST DOCTRINES

α) As in the case of the Vaiśeṣika doctrines, Somadeva makes three different statements defining Buddhist views on salvation. First, he seems to say that final release results from the practice of bhāvanā based on the realisation of nairātmya,⁵ both of which are well-known Buddhist concepts. Nairātmya is non-existence of the self, man, according to the Buddhists, is a compound of material and spiritual aggregates known as skandhas. "Just as the word 'chariot' is but a mode of expression for axle, wheels and other constituent members, placed in a certain relation to each other, but, when we come to examine the members one by one, we discover that, in an absolute sense, there is no chariot, ... in exactly the same way, the words 'living being' and 'ego' are only modes of expression for a complex of bodily and non-bodily constituents"¹ Bhāvanā is meditation or cultivation, the highest of the three stages of spiritual training recognised by the Buddhists, the other two being śraddhā (faith) and daśana (sight, personal inquiry) As Poussin says, "That is Faith, adhesion to the word of the Master To ascertain this statement by personal inquiry is what is called Sight Finally, to ponder over it until it becomes not only familiar, but actually always present to the mind, that is Cultivation"²

Somadeva ridicules the doctrine of bhāvanā as a means to salvation Anything and everything may flash across the mind in the course of bhāvanā or meditation, if salvation were to result from meditation, any swindler would obtain it³ Somadeva in this connection quotes a verse which describes an imprisoned thief as declaring that he can clearly see his beloved's face (by force of meditation), even though his eyes are closed and the prison locked up and it is pitchy dark inside⁴

The doctrine of nairātmya is set forth also in the episode of Candakarman (Book V) by the Buddhist Sugatakīrti, one of the interlocutors He maintains that the belief in a Self is nothing but 'the certain blindness of a great delusion', and quotes two verses which declare the notion of the Self to be the source of all evils

य पश्यत्यात्मानं तस्यात्मनि भवति शङ्कतः स्नेहः । स्नेहात्सुखेषु तृष्यति तृष्णा दोषांस्त्रिरस्कुर्वते ॥
आत्मनि सति परसज्ञा स्वपरविभागात्परिग्रहद्वेषौ । अन्यो सप्रतिबद्धा सर्वे दोषा प्रजायन्ते ॥

"Whoso believes in a Self conceives lasting affection for it, from affection arises desire for pleasures, and desire hides all blemishes Once there is the notion of the Self, there arises that of the not-Self, and from the distinction between one's own self and others arise attachment and hatred All evils originate, dependent on these two"—Vol II, p 252

Sugatakīrti goes on to define the Buddhist view of salvation and calls it nirodha or cessation He quotes a verse which says that, just as the flame of a lamp goes out without leaving any trace when the oil is used up, similarly a man becomes calm without attachment, when passion is destroyed, तदाह—

यथा स्नेहक्षयाद्दीप प्रशम्यति निरन्वय । तथा क्रेशक्षयाज्जन्तु प्रशम्यति निरन्वय ॥ Ibid
Such being the ultimate end of man, Sugatakīrti comes to the conclusion that all forms of religious austerities are nothing but self-torture¹ He goes on to quote a verse which enumerates the five emblems of folly the authority of the Vedas, the theory of a Creator, bathing for religious purposes, the pride of caste, and self-mortification तदुक्तम्—

वेदप्रामाण्यं कस्यचित् कर्तृवादं स्नाने धर्मेच्छा जातिवादावलेपः ।

सतापारम्भं क्लेशनाशाय चेति ध्वस्तप्रज्ञाना पञ्च लिङ्गानि जाड्ये ॥ Ibid.

Certain other verses are cited by Sugatakīrti in support of sensual enjoyment,² and the object of Somadeva is to show Buddhism in an unfavourable light, the theory of anurātmya being represented as leading to materialism. The doctrine comes in for further criticism in Sudatta's reply to Sugatakīrti. The Buddhist monk recognises his alms-bowl, the houses of the donors, and himself as recipient of the alms how can he then believe in the non-existence of the Self?³ If a man becomes extinct without leaving any trace, there can be no continuity of life,⁴ and such a unique being cannot be compared to anything else, for example, a lamp. Further, if an individual is liable to destruction at each successive moment (for, in the Buddhist view, man is not the same for two consecutive moments), how does he hold together a compact group like that of the sense organs? How can impressions abide in something that is in a state of flux? Somadeva, therefore, declares that the Buddhist doctrine is devoid of all proof, and as such cannot provide a basis for the regulation of dharma and adharma.⁵ The Buddhist, after denying the existence of the visible Self, might vociferously maintain the existence of some unseen principle (for example, the slandhas), but his position would be no better than that of the potter who asserted that his donkey had two horns, but his neighbour's ox had none!⁶ Sudatta then attacks the Buddhist doctrine that there is rebirth but no transmigration of a soul

“The Buddhist maintains that neither ‘I’ nor any one else exists nor does bondage, as a rule, result from larman in this life nor does a man reap the consequences of his actions after death. If so, why does a monk, bent on austerities, worship shrines and the like? Or, perhaps, there is no scope for austerities here. The fool is simply deluded by cheats ” (Vol II, p, 257)

b) The ancient Buddhist doctrine of Nirvāna is also mentioned by Somadeva. He states that, according to the Buddhists, emancipation consists in the emergence of a detached frame of mind,¹ and quotes two verses in illustration of the doctrine

दिशं न काचिद्विदिश न काचिन्नैवावनि गच्छति नान्तरिक्षम् ।
दीपो यथा निर्वृतिमभ्युपेत स्नेहक्षयात् केवलमेति शान्तिम् ॥
दिशं न काचिद्विदिश न काचिन्नैवावनि गच्छति नान्तरिक्षम् ।
जीवस्तथा निर्वृतिमभ्युपेत क्लेशक्षयात् केवलमेति शान्तिम् ॥

“The flame of a lamp, when the oil is used up, goes not to any of the four quarters nor to any point between nor earthwards nor skywards. Ceasing to burn, it simply becomes extinct. Just so a sentient being, when his passion is destroyed, goes not to any of the four quarters nor to any point between nor earthwards nor skywards. Becoming calm, he simply attains peace ” (Vol II, p 270)²

The end of passion (klesa) is often represented as nirvāna in early Buddhist texts. The klesas are moha ‘delusion’, rāga ‘lust’ and dosa ‘hatred or malice’. We read, for instance, in the Samyuttanikāya XXXVIII. I yo kho āvuso rāgakkhayo dosakkhayo mohakkhayo idam vuccati nibbānam ti. The end of lust, hatred and delusion is here called Nirvāna. The nature of Nirvāna is discussed in the *Mulindapañha*³ which describes it as a condition in which no evil dispositions can grow⁴. Nirvāna is supreme bliss, in which the burning heat of the threefold fire (lust, malice and delusion) is totally absent⁵. As water allays the thirst of men and beasts, so does Nirvāna allay the thirst of craving after lusts, craving after future life, and craving after worldly prosperity¹ Nirvāna is thus “a state of mind to be realised and enjoyed by a man here, on this earth, in this life, and in this life only”² If grounded in virtue, and mentally alert, “the man who orders his life aright, wheresoever he may be, will realise Nirvāna.”³ It is peace beyond compare⁴

In the Buddhist view, it is immaterial to ask what becomes of the emancipated saint after he has passed away. In the Aggi-Vacchagotta-sutta of the Majjhima-Nikāya Vacchagotta is asked by the Buddha whether he can tell in what direction an expiring fire goes, whether to east, west, north or south. The reply is na upeti, the question does not apply. The fire has simply gone out for lack of fuel to sustain it. Similarly, it is pointed out, everything by which the emancipated saint might be denoted, has passed away, has been completely extirpated, ‘reborn does not apply to him nor not reborn nor any combination of such terms’⁵

Nirvāna is in a sense freedom from rebirth. The man who sees the peril in the cycle of births (pavatta), says the Mūlindapañha, realises that it is all “burning, and blazing, full of pain and of despair”, and yearns for a state in which there is no becoming (appavatta), and concentrates his mind on it, and, after mighty endeavour, having gone far beyond the cycle of existence, attains freedom from *samsāra*⁶ “And when he has gained that, the man who has ordered his life aright has realised Nirvāna”⁷

The only criticism which Somadeva offers in respect of the Buddhist view of Nirvāna is that the soul which remains imperishable through a long succession of births cannot become extinct in the state of salvation⁸ Somadeva’s criticism is, however, beside the mark, as Nirvāna is not salvation to be enjoyed by an imperishable soul after death. As Rhys Davids says, “the parts and powers of the perfect man will be dissolved, and no new being will be born to sorrow. The wise will pass away, will go out like the flame of a lamp, and their Karma will be individualized no longer.....”

So the living, moving body of the perfect man is visible still, though its cause, has ceased to act but it will soon decay and die and pass away, and as no new body will be formed, where life was, will be nothing”¹

Nirvāna corresponds in fact to jīvanmuktatā, and this interpretation seems to have been well-known in the tenth century. Utpala, a writer of the Kasmī school of Śaivism, who lived about this time, defines Mokṣa as jīvanmuktatā, and quotes in illustration a Buddhist verse, among others, which says that samsāra consists in a state of mind sullied by lust and other impurities, while freedom from such a condition constitutes Mokṣa²

c) The third important reference to Buddhist doctrine is that to the Mādhyamika theory of Void (sūnyatā), which Somadeva attributes to “certain Buddhists who are regular cheats, and have invented the pervasive darkness of sūnyatā”³ The following definition of sūnyatā is quoted in Yasastilaka VI I (p 269)

नेनान्तस्तत्त्वमस्तीह न बहिस्तत्त्वमज्ञसा । विचारोचरातीते शून्यता श्रेयसी तत ॥

The purport of the verse is that there is no reality external or internal, hence the realisation of Void is the highest good, transcending as it does the range of the intellect. It is doubtful whether Somadeva fully appreciates the significance of the theory of sūnyatā as interpreted by Nāgārjuna and Candrakīrti in the Madhyamakakārikās and the Prasannapadā commentary respectively. The sum and substance of the doctrine is that sūnyatā is nothing but the law of causation known as pratitya-samutpāda, that is, whatever is subject to cause and condition is really unborn, has no real origination, and is hence called sūnya or void⁴. All objects have only a relative existence like a mirage or a magic show or a dream, and the doctrine of sūnya is called madhyamaka or the middle doctrine, because it avoids the two extremes of existence and non-existence⁵. The doctrine is such that it must be realised in one's own heart, and hence described as unexplained by speech and beyond the range of mental comprehension¹ Nivāna, according to the Mādhyamika school, is nothing but the realisation of sūnyatā, which consists in the cessation of the complex of worldly notions known as *prapañca*²

Somadeva has a fling at the doctrine of void, when he says that if a follower of the Sūnya theory tries to establish it by means of independent proofs, he will be contradicting his own theory that everything is sūnya 'void' 'non-existent'³ The Mādhyamikas are, however, careful to point out that what they maintain is not abhāva, non-existence, but the relative existence of things they recognise neither eternalism nor annihilationism⁴

SĀMKNHYA DOCTRINES

There are two statements defining the Sāmkhya view of salvation in Yasastilaka VI 1 The first is that salvation results from discrimination between Matter (Prakṛti) and the Self (Puruṣa)⁵ The second is that salvation is the condition in which the Self subsides in the pristine state (of pure consciousness) after the cessation of intellect, mind and egoism, resulting in the destruction of the sense organs⁶ The expression, tadā drastuh svarūpe-vasthānam, is borrowed from the Yogasūtras 1 3 The idea of the soul abiding in itself after the cessation of all mental and intellectual processes occurs in Sāmkhyasūtras 2. 34⁷

In the episode of Candakaiman (Book V), Sāmkhya doctrines are represented by Āsuri who quotes the following verse on the Sāmkhya conception of the Self (p 250)

अकर्ता निर्गुण शुद्धो नित्यः सर्वगतोऽक्रियः । अमृतश्चेतनो भोक्ता पुमान् कपिलशासने ॥

- 1 Candrakīrti (18 9) says 'विकल्पश्चित्तप्रचार तद्रहितत्वात् तत्तत्त्वं निर्विकल्पम्'
- 2 'शून्यतैव सर्वप्रपञ्चनिवृत्तिलक्षणत्वाच्चिर्वाणमित्युच्यते' Candrakīrti on Madhyamakahrīkū 18 5. Properly speaking, salvation results from the destruction of Karma and the Kleśas, but the latter spring from Vikalpas or fanciful ideas, and these again from prapañca, which is eradicated only on the realisation of Sūnyatā Nāgārjuna says कर्मक्लेशक्षयान्मोक्ष कर्मक्लेशा विकल्पत । ते प्रपञ्चात् प्रपञ्चस्तु शून्यताया निरुध्यते ॥ 18 5 Candrakīrti says 'ते च विकल्पा अनादिमत्ससाराम्यस्तात् ज्ञानबैयवाच्यवाचककर्तृकर्मकरणक्रियाघटपदमुकुटरूपवेदनास्त्रीपुरुषलाभालाभसुखदुःखयशोऽयशोनिन्दाप्रशमादिलक्षणादिचित्रात् प्रपञ्चादुपजायन्ते । स चायं लौकिक प्रपञ्च निरवशेष शून्यताया सर्वभावस्वभाव-शून्यतादर्शने सति निरुध्यते'

- 7 'तन्निवृत्तादुपशान्तोपरागः स्वस्थ'

Āsuri explains that Prakṛti contaminates the Self, even though composed of bliss, like a piece of crystal, with such manifestations as intellect, egoism and the like, which bring in their train pleasure, pain and illusion. When the Self comes to realise the nature of Prakṛti, its connection with the latter, comparable to that of fire with an iron ball, comes to an end, and the Self attains Karavya which means the cessation of all connection with knowledge and objects of knowledge¹. Āsuri then declares that since salvation results simply from discrimination between Prakṛti and the Self, it is useless to perform religious austerities, and one should therefore eat, drink, and be merry, and follow one's inclination.

अनुभवतः पितृ खादत विलसत मानयत कामित लोकाः । आत्मव्यक्तिविवेकान्मुक्तिर्ननु किं वृथा तपत ॥

This looks like a satire on the Sāmkhya theory of salvation, but similar views are expressed in an authoritative text like the Mātharavṛtti on the Sāmkhyakārikās (37), where it is stated that, according to Kapila, a man has no prescribed duties, and final beatitude results solely from the knowledge of the twenty-five principles recognised by the Sāmkhya system. The Mātharavṛtti then quotes a verse very similar to that put in the mouth of Āsuri:

हसि पितृ लल मोद नित्य विषयानुपभुञ्ज कुह च मा शङ्काम् । यदि विदित ते कपिलमत तत्प्राप्स्यसे मोक्षसौख्यं च ॥

Sudatta criticizes some of the Sāmkhya tenets in his reply to Āsuri. If, as the Sāmkhyas hold, bondage and salvation, pleasure and pain, and activity and retirement belong to Prakṛti, what is the use of postulating the existence of a Self?² Further, the Sāmkhya doctrine involves a number of self-contradictions. The Self never acts, yet it enjoys the fruits of action, it is devoid of action, yet adopts an attitude of indifference, it is eternal, yet comes into temporary association with Prakṛti, it is bound up with Prakṛti, yet separates itself from the latter, it is pure, yet it is connected with the impure body, and it is called bliss, though it has no attributes³. Besides, if the Self is eternal and without any form, it can have no connection with actions producing their results, just as the sky can have no connection with binding ropes.⁴

In VI 1 also there is some criticism of Sāmkhya views. Somadeva asks how it is possible to discriminate between the Prakṛti and the Self, both eternal and pervasive.¹ He seems also to criticize the Sāṃkhya theory that the self continues to exist without any knowledge or mental process after the cessation of its connection with the material world.² He points out that the Self is bound to have unlimited knowledge even in its pristine state, once the impurity of Karma is removed, in the same way as the Self has knowledge of things in dreams that come true.³ The analogy of dream consciousness is continued, and Somadeva contends that even a blind man can see things in a dream, and it is therefore wrong to suppose that the emancipated Self can have no knowledge, being without any sense organs.⁴ It is but natural that the intellect should reveal the entire range of objects, like the rays of the sun, once the screen of Karma is destroyed.

VEDĀNTA DOCTRINES

There are two references to Vedānta doctrines in Yasastilaka VI. 1. First, it is stated that, according to the Vedāntins, salvation takes place when Nescience, which brings about the cognition of endless divergences, is destroyed as the result of the realisation of the Absolute.⁵ Secondly, all living creatures are merged in the Absolute after the final annihilation of the body, just as the space enclosed within a jar is merged in universal space after the breaking up of the jar.⁷

Somadeva criticizes the above doctrines thus. First, if all divergence is dismissed as Nescience, how can the varied character of the world be explained, with its palpable manifestations of birth, death, pleasure and the like?⁸ Secondly, if the Absolute alone exists and nothing else, why is there no cessation of the waves of worldly phenomena?² Why is the universe distinctly seen?² Why is it not merged in the Absolute, just as the space enclosed within a jar is merged in universal space?⁹ The Vedāntins also say that the Supreme Soul is one, though it abides in each individual it is seen both as one and many, like the moon and its reflections in water. comparison is, however, fallacious, because the moon is seen as one in the sky and as many elsewhere in the form of reflections, but the undifferentiated Absolute is nowhere seen apart from the diversities of the visible world.¹

JAIMINIYA DOCTRINES

Somadeva refers to the Jaiminiyas or the followers of Jaimini, who declare that the mind is by nature impure like charcoal and collyrium, and can never be purified² This opinion is expressed also by Dhūmadhvaja in the episode of Candakaiman and Sudatta, and he deduces from it a sensualist conception of life. He maintains that just as charcoal, though rubbed, never becomes white, similarly the mind, impure by nature, never becomes pure³ Further, there is no heaven in the guise of another world for which it is worth while to perform religious austerities, the real heaven is the ardent mutual love of a maiden of twelve and a youth of sixteen!⁴ Dhūmadhvaja goes on to ridicule those who forsake the pleasures of the senses and strive for pain rather than pleasure.

The opinions of Dhūmadhvaja are controverted by Sudatta. If the mind or the inner faculty is impure, why does Kumārila in offering salutation to Śiva describe him as being composed of pure knowledge⁵ Sudatta then cites a verse which declares the existence of the eternal soul it is interwoven with all things, yet not in contact with anything, and its nature is ever pure as the sky. कथं चेद वचनमजर्यम्—

The sage concludes by saying that just as a gem tarnished by impurities can be cleansed with effort, and ore turned into gold by a process of manufacture, similarly the Self can be liberated from passion by those who are well-meaning and resort to the canon of the Arhats.⁶

The Jaiminiya doctrine is criticised also in VI. 1. Somadeva says that removal of impurities involves transformation of character, and this can be brought about through the operation of the appropriate causes as in the case of gems and pearls.¹

CĀRVĀKA DOCTRINES

Somadeva refers to the Bārhaspatyas or the followers of Brhaspati and calls them the leaders of all the Nāstikas or materialists, popularly known as the Cārvākas. According to them, *dharma*s or qualities may be said to exist only if we can be sure of the existence of a Dharmin, 'one who possesses *dharma*s', that is, the Self. Similarly, there is no other world than this, because no one lives after death. The question of salvation thus does not arise.² The Bārhaspatyas then regard emancipation as a myth.

In the episode of Candakarman and Sudatta, the former sets forth Cārvāka doctrines. He declares that those who believe in the rebirth of a dead man, those who believe in a Dharma whose result is unseen, and those who believe in a soul apart from the body are people who 'see blues and yellows'.³ The four elements, constituting the body, and moved by the five breaths, produce consciousness,⁴ just as substances like flour-water, molasses, and the Dhātākī creeper possess intoxicating properties, and just as the combination of lime, betel and areca-nut produces a red colour. Consciousness lasting from birth to death never reemerges, once it has reached its term, like a leaf fallen from the tree. Since there is no life after death,⁵ and the living creatures are like bubbles of water, all painful efforts (such as religious austerities) are futile.⁶ "One should therefore live

4 Empedocles likewise taught that "it is by these (elements) men think and feel pleasure and pain". Thought, like sense-perception, is only a function of the body, which is composed of the elements (fire, air, water and earth) Burnet Early Greek Philosophy, p. 247, Zeller Outlines of the History of Greek Philosophy, p. 57. In his religious teaching, however, Empedocles laid stress on the doctrine of transmigration of souls.

5 The important Jewish sect of the Sadducees denied 'the survival of the soul—it perishes with the body—and the rewards and punishments in Hades' Moore Judaism, Vol. II, p. 317.

6 'प्राणापानसमानोदानव्यानव्यतिकीर्णैर्भ्यः कायाकारपरिणतिसकीर्णैर्भ्यो वनपवनानिपवनसंख्येभ्यः पिष्टोदकगुडधातकौ-प्रमुखेभ्यः इव मदशक्तिः, पर्णचूर्णैकमुकेभ्यः इव रागसपत्तिस्तदात्मगुणकार्यस्वभावतया चैतन्यमुपजायते । तच्च गर्भादि-मरणपर्यन्तपर्यायमतीतं सत् पादपादं पतितं पत्रमिव न पुनः प्ररोहति । तथा च परलोकाभावे जलबुद्बुदस्वभावेषु जीवेषु merrily as long as one lives no one can escape death, and the body, burnt to ashes and extinct, never returns "

Sudatta while criticizing the above doctrines tries to establish the existence of the Self and continuity of births. He cites three factors in favour of his contention. First, a new-born child, just after his birth, sucks his mother's breast, which cannot be explained otherwise than by supposing the continuity of impressions acquired in a previous birth¹. Secondly, it is seen that certain persons become evil spirits after death. Thirdly, there are people who can remember their previous lives². Fourthly, no sentient being ever originates from the elements. Hence the conclusion that the Self exists, eternal, and conscious of the manifestations of Matter.³ Further, it is seen that the body, the sense organs, and the intellect exist only so long as the Self exists, and decay as soon as the Self departs. The Self might be supposed to be non-existent if the body and the sense-organs continued to exist even after death, but as this does not take place, the dependence of the body upon the Self must be accepted as true⁴. The fact is that the Self is not composed of the elements, it possesses qualities different from theirs. Besides, if the Self were composed of the elements, the latter would also cease to exist when the former ceased to exist⁵. The Self has characteristic qualities such as knowledge, pleasure and pain, and the elements, too, for example, earth, air and fire have their own distinctive qualities upholding, impelling and burning respectively⁶.

Some are of opinion that a bilious constitution produces among other things intelligence and intellect, but the theory cannot be accepted as valid. Increase or decrease of intelligence may be due to a corresponding excess or deficiency of bile, just as fire waxes and wanes in proportion to the quantity of fuel consumed, but the sharpness of intellect is always seen to be due to study and learning at the feet of a teacher to deny this is to contradict what is self-evident. In any case, there cannot be any causal relation between bile and intelligence, because there might be plenty of intelligence even when bile is totally absent

It follows therefore that the mind cannot be a product or attribute of the body nor can it be identical in composition with the body ¹

PĀŚUPATA DOCTRINES

Somadeva tells us that, according to the Pāśupatas, ritual alone leads to salvation, meaning thereby the system of ritual prescribed in the religious texts of the Pāśupatas. The chief Pāśupata practices mentioned by him are smearing the body with ashes in the morning, at noon and in the evening, adoration (of the idol or the phallus of Śiva or Pāśupati), ceremonial offering of water-pots (probably before the idol), circumambulation from left to right, self-humiliation and other processes ²

Somadeva does not explain any of the practices mentioned above, but we can understand most of them with the help of the commentary on the Ganakārikā of Bhāsarvajña, who flourished about the middle of the tenth century, and was probably a contemporary of Somadeva ³. It may be noted that the Ganakārikā is one of the very few works on the Pāśupata system so far published, and both the text and the commentary thereon have been quoted in the brief account of the Pāśupata school in the Sarvadarśana-samgraha. Passing references to Pāśupata doctrines are found also in the commentaries and sub-commentaries on the Vedāntasūtras 2 2 37 and specially in the Āgamaprāmānya of Yāmunaṃbunī, the teacher of Rāmānuja; but perhaps the best extant account of the system is found in the commentary called Ratnaṭīkā on Bhāsarvajña's Ganakārikā ⁴

As regards the religious practices of the Pāśupatas mentioned by Somadeva, the Ratna commentary refers not only to the smearing of the

The Ratna commentary says that these practices are designed to create a feeling of disrespect (apamāna) in the minds of the people in order that the devotee may suffer humiliation, apamāna being compared to a forest-fire and regarded as something desirable, probably because it destroys one's pride and teaches one to be meek and mild³ This is no doubt a very curious method of inculcating humility, and we are also told that the devotee should indulge in certain antics in full view of a crowd, like an actor on the stage⁴ The practices in question are krāthana or pretending to be asleep while awake, spandana or shaking the limbs like one suffering from an epileptic fit, mandana or walking like a lame man, śrngāraṇa or indulging in amorous gestures as if at the sight of a beautiful young woman, apitatarana or acting in a disgraceful manner like one devoid of commonsense, and apitadbhāsana or uttering incoherent and meaningless words

4 'रङ्गवदवसितेषु जनेषु मध्ये नटवदवसितो विवेच्य विवेच्य क्राथनादीनि कुर्यात् ।'

Salvation, according to the Pāsupatas, is not only cessation of pain but the acquisition of unlimited supernatural powers, but as far as can be judged from the scanty literature available on the doctrines of the Pāsupatas, salvation in their view does not solely depend upon ritual, as alleged by Somadeva. Caryā or ritual¹ is no doubt a very important factor in the Pāsupata system, but nevertheless it is only one among the five upāyas or means of attaining perfection in the religious life². It is, however, possible that Somadeva may be referring to contemporary Pāsupatas, who, like all followers of ritualistic systems, may be supposed to have laid particular emphasis on Caryā or Vidhi as a means of emancipation.

Caryā, also called cari and vidhikriyā, is fully explained in Kaundinya's commentary on the Pāsupata Sūtras 2 13, 3 2, 4 2 etc. It comprises the entire range of Pāsupata practices which are of two kinds public and private. The public practices are the peculiar ones mentioned above, and the devotee who undertakes them in the presence of all is called vyaktācāriṇa. The private observances are those which he carries out unseen by others and known as viśata, hence he is called gūdhavīśata.

The practices of krāthana, *mandana*³ and the rest are designed to hold up the devotee to ridicule and make him accustomed to humiliation, insults and censure. They are calculated to promote indifference to the world; and there is also the curious belief that the devotee thereby acquires the religious merit of the onlookers who insult him, and transfers his own sins to them.⁴ The Pāsupata devotee who is totally devoid of worldly ties is enjoined to go about like a man not in his senses, even like a mad man, whose true nature remains unrevealed to the people at large⁵. The indignities which he willingly suffers appear to take the place of the austerities recognised by other schools. The Pāsupata Sūtras 3 18, 19 declare, for instance, that while undergoing humiliation, the devotee, conversant with the truths, achieves the full measure of austerities. The inculcation of humility is no doubt the main purpose of these practices; as we are told that lack of pride born of caste and social standing is superior to all the Yantras, by which are meant sacrificial rites and privations such as prolonged fastings.¹ It may be noted that the Pāsupatas, unlike the later Vīṇāśaivas, recognise the caste-system. The devotee is invariably referred to as a Brāhmana, and it is forbidden to talk to a Śūdra.² But the devotee must discard pride of birth, and the Pāsupata way of life, characterized by a complete disregard for personal and social decorum, is designed to result in eradication of caste rules and intensification of varṇāgya.³

The private practices known as vrata are resorted to in the āyatana, that is, any place sacred to Śiva where the devotee may choose to reside.⁴ He must 'bathe' himself with ashes three times a day, sleep over a bed of ashes, and cleanse himself when necessary with the holy ashes (anusnāna). He may not wear a wreath of fresh flowers, but take up only such flowers as have been offered to the idol of Śiva. As part of his devotions, he does mental obeisance to the deity (namaskāra), meditates on the sacred formulas, and resorts to certain practices which are again peculiar to the Pāsupata sect. In the shrine of the deity, he breaks out into loud laughter, sings songs in Sanskrit or Prākṛit in honour of Śiva, and indulges in dancing. He makes also a sound called ḍuṇḍumkāra (called also huḍukkāra in later texts) resembling the bellowing of a bull and produced by joining the tip of the tongue to the palate.⁵ Singing and dancing as a medium of religious fervour are well-known in the history of religion. We may refer, for instance, to the early Christian sect of the Euchites, or Massahians, who, like the Pāsupatas, were quietists, lived on alms and had no possessions. They spent all their time in prayers, and indulged in frenzied dancing.⁶ Sects like the Massahians had no organisation, but appear to have led a loosely knit communal life. The Pāsupata devotions, on the other hand, were individual and carried out in seclusion.

Iyyā, as explained above, is adoration, and the worship of Śiva is no doubt the central feature of the Pāsupata cult. But yyā properly means yāga 'sacrifice', and the Pāsupatas have their own interpretation of what sacrifice is. Kaundinya says that Yāga is bhāvanā or mental concentration on

Maheśvara to the exclusion of any other deity¹ Further, we have the doctrine of atrayajana or higher sacrifice in contrast to kuyajana or the inferior sacrificial rites of the Vedic religion, so called on account of himsā and other defects inherent in them. The atrayajana is, however, nothing more than the Pāsupata scheme of discipline comprising the religious practices collectively known as Caryā.²

The Pāsupatas had, as a matter of fact, no elaborate ritual like that of the Śaivas, who had their Agamas, Tantras and Paddhatis dealing with the subject. They worshipped Śiva, the lingam or any other image of the god, Vṛsadhvaja, Sūlapāni, Nandi or Mahākāla. An important proviso laid down in the Pāsupata Sūtras is that the worshipper should have in view the Dakṣiṇāmūrti of Śiva, that is, he should stand on the southern side of the deity, turning his face towards the north.³ Stress is also laid on the meditation of the Pranava, and the devotee repeats various holy mantras which invoke the different aspects of Maheśvara.⁴ The Sādhaka no doubt worships the image of Śiva, but his attention is directed to the incorporeal aspect of the deity. Pāsupata worship is really self-surrender (atidāna) to the Supreme Being, who is without any sense organ, beyond the senses, pervasive and self-existent; who sees without eyes and hears without ears, has no intellect, but has nothing outside the scope of His knowledge, and knows all, but has no knower.⁵

Somadeva criticizes the Pāsupatas by pointing out that religious acts are useless without knowledge and faith. He opines that if a man is devoid of knowledge, his action is barren of result the blind may enjoy the shade of a tree, but not the beauty of its fruits. Further, knowledge is useless in the case of one who is lame, that is, unable to act, and so is action in the case of a blind unbeliever; it is the combination of knowledge, action and faith that leads to the realisation of the summum bonum.⁶ Somadeva

THE KULĀCĀRYAS AND TRIKAMATA

Somadeva tells us that, according to the Kulācāryas, that is, Tāntrikas, salvation results from unhesitating indulgence in all kinds of food and drink, forbidden or otherwise¹. It may be noted that another Jaina writer, Yaśahpāla, the author of the allegorical drama Moharājapaparājaya, written two centuries later, gives about the same definition of the views of the Kaulas or Kulācāryas. The Kaula in this play declares that one should daily take meat and drink heavily, that being the religion taught by him, allowing free scope to one's desires².

The views of the Kulācāryas are identified by Somadeva with Trikamata. According to this system, one should, after indulging in meat and drink, worship Śiva with wine in company with a female partner sitting on one's left during the rites the worshipper is to play the rôle of Śiva united with Pārvatī and exhibit the Yonimudrā³. This is, generally speaking, a more or less accurate picture of Tāntric ritual as elaborated in texts like Kulārnavatantra and Kulacūdāmanitantra, although many of the details are unintelligible and obscure. The use of wine and meat is a conspicuous feature of the cult. As regards relations with the other sex, the Kulacūdāmanitantra, for instance, gives a colourful description of the worshipper setting about the mystic rites at night in company with his partner, perfumed and dressed in red and richly adorned with gold ornaments, she sits on a cushion to his left and he gracefully clasps her around with his arm.⁴ It should, however, be remembered that ceremonial worship of women of all castes without any distinction is an important feature of Tāntric ritual,⁵ but the use of meat and wine for religious purposes and freedom of association with women must have led to abuses, and Somadeva has no doubt based his definition of Kaula views on what he saw and heard in his own days. The Kulārnavatantra (Chap. 9) says, like Somadeva, that the Kaulikas do not observe any restriction with regard to food and drink,¹ and goes on to declare that for them exists no injunction or prohibition, virtue or vice, heaven or hell.² But the Kaula devotee is described also as a man free from desires, ever content, impartial and chaste, without any striving and desire for heaven, and conversant with the highest truths.³ The Kaula mystics go about the world in different guises, doing good to men, inscrutable and unperceived by others⁴ The Kaula ideal is, it is true, to eat, drink and be merry, but it is also one of concord and amity, for the Kaula is enjoined not to make any distinction between "You" and "I"⁵ Salvation, according to the Kaula system, seems to be union with Śiva to be attained by knowledge, ignorance being destroyed by the performance of one's religious duties⁶. Somadeva's definition of Kaula views does not take into consideration this aspect of the cult, and he criticizes the Kaula standpoint by asserting that if salvation was the outcome of reckless living, it would sooner come to the thugs and butchers than to the Kaulas⁷

Somadeva, as we have seen, treats the Kaula doctrine as identical with Trikamata, to which there is another reference in Book I. We are told that the young prince Māradatta considered his body to be divine like one initiated into the Trika doctrine⁸ The commentary of Śrutasāgara takes Trikamata to mean Śaiva doctrine, and the divine character of the body seems to be a tenet common to the Śaiva and Tāntrika systems. The Kulārnavatantra (Chap 9) says, for instance, that the body is the abode of the gods, while the Self is Lord Sadāśiva himself⁹ The doctrine is found in a more developed form in the Sūtasamhitā (belonging to the Skandapurāṇa), a comprehensive work of the Advaita school of Śaivism. The Sūtasamhitā says among other things that the various organs are presided, over by various deities; for example, the sun is the deity of the eye, Varuna that of the tongue, Fire that of speech and so on. Moreover, five deities are said to abide in the body composed of the five elements, Brahman in the earthy portion, Īśvara in the airy portion, Viṣṇu in the watery portion, Rudra in the fiery portion, and Sadāśiva himself in the portion of the body composed of ether. For this reason the body, whether one's own or that of another, should be honoured as having a divine character (devatāmaya), no one should be despised even by mistake, and even a fool or a villain should be respected as possessing a body that is divine.¹ Similar views are expressed in the S'vapurāṇa (Sanatkumāra-saṃhita, Chap 39)²

A passing reference to Tantric doctrine as Mantravāda dealing with the mystic diagrams or Yantias occurs in Book I.³

ŚAIVA DOCTRINES

Śaiva doctrines are prominently dealt with in the episode of Candakarman in Yasastilaka, Book V (pp. 251, 254ff.); and the discussion is of particular interest in view of the struggle of Jainism against the rising tide of Śaivism in certain parts of India in the age of Somadeva and after. Haraprabodha, one of the companions of Candakarman, is a Śaiva and declares that Lord Śiva has two ways of doing good to the world—the Daksina Mārga or the Righthand Path and the Vāmamārga or the Lefthand Path.⁴ Of these the Righthand Path is meant for general usage,⁵ and two verses are quoted to illustrate its principles (Vol. II, p. 251):

प्रपञ्चरहितं शास्त्रं प्रपञ्चरहितो गुरुः । प्रपञ्चरहितं ज्ञानं प्रपञ्चरहितः शिवः ॥

शिवं शक्तिविनाशेन ये वाञ्छन्ति नराधमाः । ते भूमिरहिताद्दीजात् सन्तु नूनं फलोत्तमाः ॥

To these may be added another verse quoted in VI 19 (Vol II, p. 317):

अद्वैताज्ञ परं तत्त्वं न देवः शंकरात् परः । शैवशास्त्रात् परं नास्ति भुक्तिमुक्तिप्रदं वचः ॥

The first verse declares that the Śāstra, the Teacher, the true knowledge, and Śiva himself are without any connection with prapañca or worldly phenomena. The second verse emphasizes the organic connection between Śiva and Śakti, and declares that to accept Śiva without accepting Śakti is like expecting a harvest from seeds without the intermediary of earth

The third verse declares that there is no truth higher than non-duality, no god higher than Śiva, and no science more capable of guaranteeing happiness as well as liberation than the Śaiva doctrine.

The three verses quoted by Somadeva may be said to sum up the doctrines of the Advaita school of Śaivism, as propounded in texts like the Śvapurāṇa, the Sūtasamhitā,¹ and the Īśvaragītā incorporated in the Kūrmapurāṇa. The doctrines represent a Śaiva adaptation of the views of Advaita Vedānta, whose doctrine of non-duality is mentioned with approval in the Śvapurāṇa (Jñānasamhitā)² The latter text, in one place, uses the significant expression advaita-saiva-veda to denote the Śaiva system and its antagonism to the conception of dvaita or duality.³ The Śaiva doctrine, as developed in the aforesaid texts, postulates absolute non-duality and denies the reality of prapañca and samsāra, that is, worldly phenomena and the course of mundane life.⁴ Śiva alone exists self-luminous; and the universe being an outcome of his own Power, nothing exists apart from the Supreme Deity.⁵ Śakti, the inherent and conscious Power of Śiva, creates the universe according to his will, and this Power, without beginning and end, is called Māyā, the cause of the material world.⁶ No relationship is possible between the visible phenomena and the Supreme Soul, just as there cannot be any connection between darkness and light,⁷ but the universe is ultimately merged in Śiva, just as foam and waves rise from the ocean and are merged in the ocean.⁸ 'Knowledge free from worldly phenomena' (prapañca-rahitaṁ ñānam) seems to refer to the state of samādhi, in which the devotee no longer perceives the objects of the world and becomes united with the Supreme Soul.¹ 'The Teacher free from worldly phenomena' (prapañca-rahito guruh) is the religious preceptor, who is identified with Śiva, and, in the ultimate resort, Śiva himself.² The indispensable and inseparable connection between Śiva and Śakti, set forth by Haraprabodha, is frequently emphasized in Śaiva texts and forms a fundamental dogma of the Śaiva system.³

The Vāmamārga or the Lefthand Path devised by Śiva is described as leading to pleasure as well as salvation,⁴ and corresponds to the grosser aspect of the Tantric cult. The following verse is cited by Haraprabodha to illustrate the Vāmamārga (Vol II, p 251).

अग्निवत् सर्वभक्षोऽपि भवभक्तिपरायण । भुक्तिं जीवन्नाप्नोति मुक्तिं तु लभते मृतः ॥

'One who is devoted to Śiva obtains pleasure in life and release on death, even though he is omnivorous like Fire.'

The verse quoted from the poet Bhāsa⁵ as a further illustration of the Vāmamārga advocates the pleasures of love and wine, and completes the picture of the Path as one of gross sensualism combined with devotion to Śiva. It goes without saying that the Advaita school of Śaivism condemns the Vāmamārga as non-Vedic and hindering the rise of 'true knowledge'.⁶ The former school glorifies bhakti, and asserts that it is Śiva, united with Śakti, that vouchsafes joy as well as liberation, and shines in the hearts of those who are sincerely devoted to him.⁷

Śudatta's reply to Haraprabodha provides a good example of Jaina polemic against Śaivism, and enables us to have an idea of the chief points at issue between the two schools of thought. The following verse quoted by

1 यदा सर्वाणि भूतानि समाधिस्थो न पश्यति । एकीभूत परेणासौ तदा भवति केवल ॥ Ibid (verse 25). Also सदा साक्षिस्वरूपत्वाच्छिव एवासि केवल । इति धीर्या मुनिश्रेष्ठ सा समाधिरिहोच्यते ॥ Ibid

Somadeva and put in the mouth of Sudatta (P 254) records the Jaina objections to the theory of Śiva being the source of scriptural knowledge. तदुक्तम्—

वक्ता नैव सदाशिवो विकरणस्तस्मात् परो रागवान् द्वैविध्यादपरं तृतीयमिति चेत्तत् कस्य हेतोरभूत् ।

शक्या चेत् परकीयया कथमसौ तद्वानसंबन्धतः संबन्धोऽपि न जाघटीति भवता शास्त्रं निराख्यनम् ॥

The idea of the verse is that Sadāśiva cannot be the expounder of a system, since he is incorporeal nor can this rôle be attributed to the deity in his corporeal aspect, for example, to Śiva as the consort of Pārvatī, because as such he is subject to passion, which makes him unfit for the task. A third alternative is lacking, and it cannot be urged that he expounds the system by means of an extraneous Śakti or Power, because he cannot be supposed to possess any such Power owing to the absence of any integral relationship between the two. It follows therefore that the sāstra of the Śaivas is without any authoritative foundation¹ This dismisses another claim of the Śaivas that a very rare sāstra originated from Śiva in the form of Nāda or Sound.²

Sudatta then points out certain inconsistencies in the Śaiva doctrine resulting from the two mutually conflicting conceptions of Śiva, the corporeal Rudra and the incorporeal Sadāśiva. The Jaina sage argues that if Rudra is regarded as omniscient, even though he is subject to passion and similar affections, that will contradict Patañjali's definition of Īśvara or the Supreme Being as one untouched by passions, acts, consequences and impressions, and hence possessing the highest degree of omniscience. It is a fallacy to associate omniscience and passion with the same person, and a conception of Rudra, worldly yet omniscient, contradicts also the assertion that Śiva possesses the qualities of freedom from passion, self-control, and omniscience besides irresistible might, contentment, supreme bliss, and untrammelled energy.³

Sudatta continues the argument and shows that the conception of the incorporeal Sadāśiva also involves similar contradictions. The poet Grahṇa,⁴ for instance, in his hymn to Sadāśiva, speaks of the phallus of the god and the inability of Brahman and Visnu to find out its limit, and refers also to the burning of the three cities of the demons by Śiva when the earth became his chariot, Indra his charioteer, the sun and the moon the chariot-wheels and so on.⁵ Further, there is another aspect of Sadāśiva which is not in keeping with the character of an incorporeal being. Sudatta quotes in this connection a verse, which says that a living creature is steeped in ignorance and not a master of his own destinies, and goes to heaven or hell, as directed by Īśvara or Śiva (Vol. II, p. 255)

It may be noted that the verse is cited in many texts¹ as an illustration of the supreme power of God, and incorporated in the *Śivapurāṇa*² to show that a sentient being is nothing but a plaything in the hand of Śiva.³ What is important is that the Śaiva system regards Śiva as the preraka or prerayitā, the great moving or directing force of the universe.⁴ Bhoktā or the Self, Bhogya or Matter and Pierayitā or the Mover are, as a matter of fact, three fundamental concepts of the Śaiva system,⁵ and the moving power is known also as the Kriyāśakti of Śiva.⁶ The Jainas, however, regard this as inconsistent with the conception of Śiva as the incorporeal Sadāśiva. Sudatta contends that it is impossible for the ethereal Sadāśiva to move others; and it is also doubtful whether one who is himself never moved by others should be able to move any one else.⁷

The Jainas attack also the conception of Śiva as the creator of the universe.⁸ Sudatta begins his argument by quoting a verse in which Śiva is addressed as the primeval architect of the universe (P. 255).

भोग्येऽप्यस्मिन् भवति मिथुने पुष्कलस्तत्र हेतुर्नीलग्रीव त्वमसि भुवनस्थापनासूत्रधार ॥

The sense of the verse is that the Bhoktā or the Soul in bondage cannot evolve any change in unconscious Matter, called Bhogyā or Prakṛti, and the interaction of the two is entirely due to the initiative of Śiva, who sets in motion the process of cosmic evolution.⁹ The Jainas, however, do not admit the existence of a personal creator of the universe, and Sudatta utters the following verse which sums up the Jaina objection (P. 256):

कर्ता न तावदिह कोऽपि धियेच्छया वा दृष्टोऽन्यथा कटकृतावपि स प्रसंगः ।

कार्यं किमत्र सदनादिषु तक्षकाद्यैराहत्य चेत् त्रिभुवन पुरुषः करोति ॥

The idea of the verse is that no one who creates the world by intellect or will has ever been seen; and if an invisible creator is postulated, even the making of a mat might be attributed to him. Further, if there is really some one who builds up the universe, there will be nothing left for carpenters and others to do!¹

Further, Sudatta contends that the conception of Īśvara is redundant, because what is called Īśvara is only another name for Karma. He quotes a verse which records the synonyms of Purākṛta or Karma done in previous births, and among these Īśvara is also included (p. 256):

विधिर्विधाता नियतिः स्वभावः कालो ग्रहश्चैश्वर्यदेवकर्म ।

वृण्यानि भाग्यानि तथा कृतान्तः पर्यायनामानि पुराकृतस्य ॥

It cannot be urged that Karma, being insentient, is powerless to serve as an agent for the enjoyment or suffering of others.² Insentient objects like jewels, magnet and wind are known to have the power of acting upon other objects, and the same is true of Karma.³ Sudatta in this connection quotes a verse from a work named *Ratnaparikṣā*⁴ in order to prove the miraculous efficacy of jewels in counteracting evils even from a distance. However that may be, the rôle of shaping the destinies of creatures is assigned exclusively to Karma; and the position of God, even if he exists, is reduced to that of a servant.⁵ The Jaina doctrine of Karma is calculated to exalt the Self and inculcate self-reliance, since each individual has to solve the problem of existence and liberation by his personal effort. The emphasis is always upon Karma; and Sudatta concludes his sermon by quoting a verse, which declares that the Self by itself acts and reaps the consequences of its deeds, by itself it passes through worldly existence, and by itself is liberated from its bonds (p. 256):

स्वयं कर्म करोत्यात्मा स्वयं तत्फलमश्नुते । स्वयं भ्रमति संसारे स्वयं तस्माद्विमुच्यते ॥

It should be noted that the universe in the Jaina view is uncreated, eternal and endless,⁶ hence the objection to the theory of a personal creator, God or Śiva. It will also be seen that the controversy between Jainism and Śaivism centering round the problem of creation resolved itself into one between the theories of Karma and God, and the identification of Śiva with God was facilitated by the fact that the word Īśvara means both Śiva and God.

Another point at issue between Śaivism and Jainism is the question of omniscience; and it must be said to the credit of Somadeva that he fully reproduces the Śaiva point of view in the course of his exposition of Jaina doctrines.¹ The Śaivas point out, with reference to the Jaina conception of Tirthamkara or Supreme Teacher, that the Janas regard a human being as āpta or omniscient, despite the fact that it is extremely difficult for a human being to attain omniscience. Even supposing that a Tirthakara is omniscient, it will be necessary to find out his teacher, because no man can acquire knowledge by his own effort without the help of a teacher. If it is said that the teacher of a Tirthakara is another Tirthakara, one will have to discover the teacher of the latter as well and so on, until we are faced with the absurdity of an endless series of Tirthakaras and their teachers. The only way to avoid such a situation is to accept either Sadāśiva or Śiva, the consort of Pārvatī, as the teacher of a Tirthakara, and the Śaivas in this connection cite the authority of the Yogasūtras 1. 26, which declare Īśvara to be the eternal teacher of all primeval teachers.² The Śaivas also assert that a very rare sāstra arose from the incorporeal and quiescent Śiva in the form of Sound, the implication being that such a Being is fit to be the guru of a Tirthakara.³ Further, they contend that there should only be one Āpta or Omniscient Being. There cannot be a multitude of āptas like that of other creatures, and there is no reason why there should be only twenty-four of them, that being the number of Tirthakaras recognised by the Janas.⁴

Somadeva replies that a Tirthakara who possesses three kinds of supernatural knowledge is not the person to require the help of a teacher,⁵ and tries to meet the Śaiva objections by showing that the Tirthakaras are not the only persons who have attained knowledge of the highest truths by their own initiative. As an illustration of this, Somadeva cites a legend concerning the rise of the Vaiśeṣika system of philosophy, according to which the knowledge of the six categories spontaneously dawned upon the sage Kanāda in Benares, and Śiva, in the form of an owl, exhorted him to communicate the divine revelation to the Brāhmanas.¹ Somadeva does not mention the source of his story, but it seems to be a variation of the popular legend that Śiva, assuming the shape of an owl (ulūka), communicated the Vaiśeṣika philosophy to Kanāda, whence the name Āulūkyā given to that system.² The crucial point, however, is that even the highest truths can be known by one's own efforts without instruction by a teacher; it is therefore futile to foist an imaginary preceptor upon the Jaina Tirthakaras. As regards their number, there is nothing abnormal about it, since there are many things in the world of which a considerable number is known to exist, for instance, lunar days, stars, planets, oceans, mountains and the rest.³

It may be noted that the controversy between the Śaivas and the Jainas on the subject of omniscience is at the bottom a contest between two rival conceptions, the Śaivas reserving the term sarvajña 'omniscient' for Śiva and the Jainas doing the same for each one of their Tirthakaras. The Jaina standpoint will be clear from their definition of Āpta.⁴ As regards Śiva, he is consistently called sarvajña in Śaiva texts,⁵ and omniscience is one of the five śaktis attributed to him.⁶

The Jainas attack also the doctrine of Śiva and Śakti, to which prominence is given in Śaiva works. Somadeva attempts to prove that the relationship between Śiva and Śakti is a fiction, because the supposed connection can be described neither as samyoga 'conjunction' nor as samavāya 'inherence'. He points out that, according to the Yauga doctrine, that is, the Nyāya theory, samyoga or conjunction is possible only between two substances, but śakti or potency is not a substance, hence there can be no samyoga between Śiva and Śakti. Nor can samavāya or inherence be supposed to be the basis of relationship between Śiva and Śakti. According to the Vaiśeṣika theory, samavāya or inherence is the permanent relation between two things which are not known to exist separately, for example, a quality and the qualified. Śakti is, however, known to exist and operate separately from Śiva; so there can be no samavāya relationship between the two.¹

There is no doubt that Somadeva gives a fairly comprehensive account of the philosophical controversies of the Śaivas and the Jains current in his own age. The Śaivas attacked the Jaina theory of Arhat or the Perfect Saint and tried to establish the superiority of Śiva to any such finite personality, whether called Arhat or Tīrthamkara. Somadeva, as we have seen, sums up some of the Śaiva objections; and we find a similar attack on the Jaina conception of the Arhat also in the Īśāna-svāgurunāthapaddhati,² a comprehensive work on Śaiva doctrine and ritual, which records the teachings of a line of Śaiva Yogins, who were influential in many parts of India during the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries.³ The rivalry of these two important sects covering a considerable period lends more than an academic interest to their controversies in the field of speculative thought.

Somadeva condemns certain fundamental concepts of the Śaiva and Tāntric systems in Yasastilaka VIII. 39.⁴ They are chiefly Jyotiḥ, Bindu, Nāda, Kundalī, and Nṛbiṅgarāṇa. Jyotiḥ 'Light' is one of the mystic names of Śiva. In Sanskrit the word is neuter, and it is usual to designate the Śiva-tattva as masculine and feminine and neuter to denote its comprehensive and transcendental character.⁵ The Pranava or Om syllable, which is the expression of Śiva, is also called Jyotiḥ.⁶ Kalā is one of the thirty-six principles of the Śaiva system, and denotes the agency which unfolds the power of human beings to act.⁷ In other words, Kalā is the source of the limited power of action possessed by the Paśus or creatures in bondage.⁸

Nāda and Bindu are two concepts always mentioned together, but not specifically recognised by certain texts, as pointed out by Rāghavabhaṭṭa in his commentary on Śāradātīlaka 1. 7. The *Śvapurāṇa*⁹ says that, at the beginning of creation, Śakti, the latent energy of Śiva, becomes manifest by the will of Śiva; and when Śakti is stirred up by the creative urge of Śiva, there arises Nāda whence emerges Bindu. From Bindu arises Sadāsiva, from the latter Maheśvara, and from the latter again Vidyā, the expressive energy of Śiva consisting of the letters of the alphabet. The foregoing account adds Nāda and Bindu to the five usually accepted Śuddhatattvas, viz. Śiva, Śakti, Sadāsiva, Īśvara or Maheśvara and Vidyā. The Tattvaprahāsa of Bhoja, for instance, recognises only these five, and remarks that Nāda and Bindu are included in the Śivatattva.¹

It is in some of the Tantras that we find an exhaustive treatment of Nāda and Bindu.² Roughly speaking, Nāda represents the awakening and Bindu the active aspect of Śakti.³ According to Śāradātīlaka 17, from Śiva emerges Śakti, from Śakti Nāda, and from Nāda Bindu.⁴ The Prapañcasāratāntara (1. 42, 43), explaining the next stage of evolution, says that the Bindu splits up into three portions Bindu and Nāda (different from the first two) and Bija, of which Bindu represents Īśvara or consciousness and Bija unconscious matter, while Nāda represents Purusa or the Self, the blend of consciousness with unconscious Matter. While the original Bindu is in the process of disintegration, there arises an indistinct sound, and this is known as Śabdabrahma, the consciousness abiding in the creatures of the universe⁵ and the basic foundation of sounds and their meanings. According to Rāghavabhatta, Nāda and Bindu represent the indistinct, undifferentiated and pervasive sound emerging at the beginning of the process of cosmic evolution initiated by Śiva, and it is this sound that is known as Śabdabrahma.⁶ There are also other interpretations, but there is no doubt that Nāda and Bindu were fundamental concepts of the Śaiva system in Somadeva's time.

Although Śabdabrahma is universal and all-pervading, it abides in the form of Kundalī, better known as Kundalinī.⁷ Kundalinī is the stored up energy inherent in each individual and the force that produces all forms of sound from the primitive inarticulate murmur to organised literary speech.

7 Ibid 25. 35, Mādhavācārya in his comm. on Sūtasamhitā (Śivamāhātmyakhanda 5. 9) says 'स एव शब्दब्रह्मात्मको रवौ जगदुपादानं बिन्दुतादात्म्येन सर्वगतोऽपि प्राणिना मूलाधारेऽभिव्यज्यत इत्युक्तम्—स तु सर्वं सस्यूतो मूले व्यक्तस्तथा पुन । आविर्भवति देहेषु प्राणिनामर्धविस्तृतः ॥ (Prapañcasāra 1. 63) देहेष्विति मूलाधाराप्रदेशे '

The seat of Kundalinī is the plexus known as Mūlādhāra,¹ and it is described also as being enclosed within the Susumnā artery² Kundalinī is visualised as a coiled up (kundalibhūta) serpent, but Rāghavabhatta, commenting on Sārādātīlaka, 1. 51³ points out that there is an artery shaped like a coiled up serpent in the mūlādhāra, and this, propelled by nerve-force (Vāyu), travels to all parts of the body. This movement of Kundalinī under the action of Vāyu is called gunana,⁴ and this is what Somadeva means by kundali-vāyu-samcara in Yasastilaka VIII 39. Lastly, Nirbījkarana is a Yogic process aimed at complete mastery over the body.⁵

In addition to the doctrines outlined above, stray allusions to philosophical topics are occasionally found in Yasastilaka in the course of descriptions, often in artificial comparisons based on word-play. They are of lesser importance and belong to a type common in Kāvya literature.⁶

6 A marginal note in Ms. A on a verse in Yasastilaka, Book VI, section 10, p: 296, explaining the expression विज्ञान ('ज्ञानविज्ञानयोस्तथा विपश्चिन्नं च विभ्रमेत्'), tells us that विज्ञान refers to Nirbījkarana, which is a process of expelling the seminal fluid through the eyes, navel etc. A similar note on the relevant verse in Book VIII, section 32, says the same thing, and adds that the process in question helps one to conquer death by dint of constant practice. Somadeva says ज्योतिर्विन्दु कला नाद कुण्डलीवायुसचर । मुद्रामण्डल-चोद्यानि निर्बीजीकरणादिकम् ॥ नामौ नेत्रे ललाटे च ब्रह्मग्रन्थौ च तालुनि । अस्मिन्मध्ये रवौ चन्द्रे लतातन्तौ हृदकुरे ॥ मृत्युजय यदन्तेषु तत्तत्त्व किल मुक्तये । अहो मूढधियामेष नय स्वपरवच्चन ॥ Yasastilaka Vol II, p 393 Ms. A says नेत्रनाभिमुखमार्गेण शुक्लनिष्कासनकर्म मृत्युजय भवति साधनाभ्यासेन । नासिकायामग्नितत्त्व वर्तते । रवौ दक्षिणाब्ज्या चन्द्रे वामनाब्ज्याम् । लतातन्तौ लिङ्गविषये । हृदये छिद्रं विनापि तदा काले मेदसदृशग्रन्थि स्यात्. It will be seen that Somadeva uses symbolic terms of the Tantra, and the process of Nirbījkarana has in view various openings of the body. The Jaina author condemns such Yogic practices.

The Vaiśeṣika theory of salvation comes in for further criticism in a verse occurring in Book VIII, section 37, wherein it is stated that he who does not admit the existence of knowledge and other attributes in the emancipated self cannot postulate the existence of the Self at all, because there cannot be a Self without attributes, just as there cannot be fire without heat. विज्ञानप्रमुखा मन्ति विमुचि न गुणाः किल यस्य नयोऽत्र वाचि । तस्यैव पुनानपि नैव तत्र दाहाद्दहनं क इहापरोऽत्र । Yasastilaka, Vol. II, p. 388. Ms. A explains विमुचि as मुक्तजीवे, and remarks: उष्णत्वं विना यथादिग्निर्नास्ति तथा विज्ञानादियुगान् विना आत्मापि नास्ति नय is taken as referring either to Śaiva or Kanāda.

CHAPTER IX

SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT

In the preceding chapter we have summarized the doctrines of the various non-Jaina systems recorded or discussed by Somadeva in Yasastilaka, and we may here enumerate the different systems mentioned by the author and bring together some additional information bearing on the character and historical position of certain of these schools of thought. Towards the beginning of Book VI Somadeva mentions the following schools: Saiddhānta Vaiśeṣikas, Tārkika Vaiśeṣikas, Followers of Kanāda, Pāśupatas, Kulācāryas,¹ Sāmkhyas, Kāpilas; Buddhists mentioned separately as (1) the Disciples of Daśabala, (2) Tāthāgatah, and (3) those who preach the doctrine of the Void, Jaiminīyas, Bārhaspatyas or the followers of the Lokāyata system, Followers of the Vedānta philosophy mentioned twice as Vedāntavādins and Brahmādvaitavādins.

It will be seen that some of the schools of thought are mentioned more than once by way of demonstrating different aspects of the views held by them. In addition to these, Somadeva records Śaiva doctrines and the views of those who believed in the efficacy of Vedic sacrifices. The followers of these schools of thought were obviously contemporaries of Somadeva and so prevailed in the tenth century. It is interesting to compare the non-Jaina systems described in Yasastilaka with the non-Buddhist systems recorded in the ancient Tamil Buddhist Kāvya Manimekhalai. Chapter XXVII of that work considers ten such systems: (1) the Pramānavāda of the Vaidika systems, (2) Śaivavāda (3) Brahmavāda (4) Nārāyaṇīya or Vaiṣṇavavāda (5) Vedavāda (6) Ājīvika (7) Nirgrantha i. e. Jaina (8) Sāmkhya (9) Vaiśeṣika and (10) Bhūtavāda or the Lokāyata system.² If we compare the two lists, we shall find that Vaiṣṇavavāda is a notable omission in Somadeva's summary, while the latter makes only a passing reference to the Ājīvikas without mentioning anything about their doctrines.

It may also be pointed out that Somadeva makes a general reference to the four systems (Samayas) in Yasastilaka, II 32 and the four systems and the six schools of philosophy (Darśanas) in Book IV.³ Śrutasāgara in his commentary on II 32 explains the four Samayas as the Jaina, Śaiva, Vaidika, and Bauddha systems, while in his commentary on Book IV he takes them to mean the Jaina, Jaiminīya, Buddhist and Śaiva systems, and explains the six Darśanas as these four plus the Sāmkhya and Lokāyata systems. It is difficult to say how far this interpretation is correct, but the six Darśanas referred to by Somadeva seem to be identical with the six Tarkas enumerated by Rājaśekhara in Kāvyamīmāṃsā (Chap 2), viz the Jaina and Buddhist Darśanas and the Lokāyata forming one group, and the Sāmkhya, the Nyāya, and the Vaiśeṣika forming another group¹. It is probable that this classification of the Darśanas was popular at the tenth century, the age of Rājaśekhara and Somadeva. It may be noted in this connection that the Darśanas seem to have been variously classified at different epochs for example, in Vāyupurāṇa 104-16 the six Darśanas are stated to be Brāhma, Śaiva, Vaiṣṇava, Saura, Śākta, and Ārhatta i.e. Jaina². Similarly, in Jñānārṇavatāntara 16-131-134 we find mentioned the Śaivadarśana, Śāktadarśana, Brāhmadarśana, Vaiṣṇavadarśana, Sūryadarśana, and Bauddhadarśana. Certain points relating to some of the systems criticized by Somadeva require further elucidation.

1 It is not clear why Somadeva connects Trika-mata with the doctrines of the Kulācāryas. The Trika system usually refers to the Kashmir School of Śaivism.

2 Aiyangar Manimekhalai in its historical setting, p 189 ff.

SAIDDHĀNTA VAIŚEŚIKAS

The mention of two distinct schools of Vaiśeṣika philosophy, Saiddhānta and Tārīka, in Yasāstilaka is a noteworthy feature, and, as we have seen, the former school laid stress on the worship of Śiva and faith in him, while the latter represented the orthodox school with emphasis on Dharma and the knowledge of the categories. We do not know when the Saiddhānta school came into being, but the followers of this school seem to be the same as the Vṛddha Vaiśeṣikas mentioned by Vidyānanda (9th century) in his Āptaparīkṣā, wherein he remarks that they propound the existence of Maheśvara or Śiva in reality, just as they believe in the reality of Substances, Qualities, Actions, Generality, Particularity, Inherence etc., that is, the categories recognised by the Vaiśeṣika system as such³. The same work tells us that a certain section of the Vaiśeṣikas (unlike the orthodox school) postulates the existence of consciousness even in the liberated soul⁴; it is not the pure and infinite consciousness of the Self recognised by the Sāmkhyas, but jñānaśakti or intellectual power,⁵ and Maheśvara, like the liberated soul, possesses this power, although he is incorporeal and untouched by Karmas.¹ This school of Vaiśeṣikas which holds that the soul is ever conscious and has the power of knowledge even in the state of liberation, and seems also to believe in Śiva, might be allied to the Sāiddhānta Vaiśeṣikas mentioned by Somadeva.

Gunaratna tells us in his commentary on Saddarsanasamuccaya (Chap 2) that the Naiyāyikas are Śaivas and the Vaisesikas are Pāsupatas. The Pāsupatas were a Śaiva sect, but it is impossible to rely on Gunaratna's statement for the purpose of determining the religious affiliation of the Vaiśeṣika centuries earlier than his time. Somadeva's reference to the Tārkika Vaiśeṣikas shows that there were adherents of the system who were not worshippers of Śiva or Paśupati. Among the medieval exponents of the Vaiśeṣika system Vyomaśiva and Udayana were Śaivas, while Śīdhara pays homage to Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva separately or conjointly in the opening verses of the different sections of his Nyāyakandalī. Apart from the personal beliefs of individual thinkers, Vyomasiva distinctly says in his commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya in the section on Viparyaya (P 543) that the Supreme Śiva is different from the worldly souls, and His worship leads to beatitude this, he says, is the salutary teaching of the Vaiśeṣikas.² It would thus appear that the views of Vyomasiva were closely allied to those of the Sāiddhānta Vaiśeṣikas, who held that faith in Śiva was an essential means to final release. Further, while commenting upon the opening verse of the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya, Vyomasiva, unlike Udayana and Śīdhara, explains the term Īśvara in the phrase pranamyā hetumīśvaram as Maheśvara, that is, Śiva.³ Considering the devotion to Śiva evinced by Vyomasiva in his commentary, it will not be wrong to associate him with the Sāiddhānta school of Vaiśeṣika philosophers. As regards the term Maheśvara, it occurs even in the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya, but here it means the Supreme Lord or the great God who initiates the process of creation. Udayana, for example, explains Maheśvara as mahān īśvarah in the relevant section of his commentary on the Bhāṣya, and takes it to mean Parameśvara.⁴

BUDDHISTS

The Buddhist doctrines of salvation mentioned by Somadeva have been explained in the preceding chapter with reference to ancient texts, but it is more likely that Somadeva derived his information from later works prevalent in his time. He says, for instance, 'nairātmyādi-nvedita-sambhāvanāto bhāvanātaḥ' which seems to refer to what is called Nairātmya-bhāvanā in later Buddhist texts. Śāntaraksita, for example, who belongs to the eighth century, deals fully with the doctrine of Nairātmya in Tattvasamgraha (vv. 3488 ff). He tells us that the notions of 'I' and 'mine', known as sattvadṛṣṭi, are the source of endless suffering, and the only antidote against sattvadṛṣṭi is the realisation of Nairātmya (non-existence of the Self), suffering ceases when the conception of 'I' and 'mine' ceases to exist, and when suffering ends there is no more birth. Final release is the outcome of absolute freedom from rebirth, and the realisation of Nairātmya is the peerless gateway to the supreme beatitude. Because, liberation takes place only when egoism comes to an end, and egoism never comes to an end so long as one believes in a Self.¹

Śāntaraksita declares that the Buddha is omniscient, because it is he who for the first time propounded the doctrine of Nairātmya, and that is also why he is supreme among the founders of religious systems.² Mere realisation of Nairātmya, however, does not lead to the desired goal. What is essential is fervent and constant contemplation (Bhāvanā), ranging over a long period, in the course of which the knowledge of all objects flashes across the mind. It is all-comprehensive Nairātmyabhāvanā of this type that is cultivated by the kind-hearted devotee who desires to do good to the world. For we are told that there are two hindrances to the realisation of the truth, klesāvarana and jñeyāvarana the first is nothing but the klesas (lust, hatred and delusion) that obstruct the vision of the truth, and the second consists in the inability to recognise and comprehend the nature of the true and the false. Direct realisation of Nairātmya does away with klesāvarana, but jñeyāvarana cannot be got rid of without fervent, constant and prolonged cultivation of the principle of Nairātmya. The Bhāvanā is practised by some in anxiety for their own release from the sufferings of the world and the cycle of births, while others, philanthropic by nature, are moved to pity by the miseries of the world, and without taking thought of their own interest, consider all worldly beings as their own selves and strive for the salvation of all kindness is the motive which prompts such men to betake themselves to Nairātmya-bhāvanā. All this will be clear from the following extracts from the commentary of Kamalaśīla on Tattvasaṃgraha:

या सादरनैरन्तर्यदीर्घकालविशेषगा भावना सा करतलायमानग्राह्यावभासमानज्ञानफला तद्यथा कामातुरस्य कामिनीभावना ..सर्वाकारसर्वमतनैरात्म्यभावना कारुणिकस्येति स्वभावहेतु । (v 3339) क्लेशज्ञेयावरणप्रहाणतो हि सर्वज्ञत्वम्, तत्र क्लेशा एव रागादयो भूतदर्शनप्रतिबन्धभावान् क्लेशावरणमुच्यन्ते । दृष्टस्यापि हेयोपादेयतत्त्वस्य यत् सर्वाकारपरिज्ञान प्रतिपादनासामर्थ्यं च ज्ञेयावरणम् । तत्र क्लेशावरणस्य नैरात्म्यप्रत्यक्षीकरणान् प्रहाणि । ज्ञेयावरणस्य तु तस्यैव नैरात्म्यदर्शनस्य सादरनिरन्तर्यदीर्घकालाभ्यासात् । ..ये तावज्जात्यादिदु खोत्पीडितमानसा ससारादुन्नतमनसस्तदुपशममात्मन प्रार्थयन्ते, तेषां .. ससाराद्भयमेव नैरात्म्यभावनार्थित्वनिमित्तम् । ये तु गोत्रविशेषात् प्रकृत्यैव परहितकरणैकामिरामा सस्कारादिदु खत्रितयपरिपीडित जगदवैश्य कृपापरतन्त्रतया तद्दु खदु खिन स्वात्मनि व्यपेक्षामपास्य सकलानेव ससारिण आत्मत्वेनाभ्युपगतास्तत्परित्राणाय प्रणिदधते तेषां कर्तृत्वं भावनाप्रवृत्तिनिमित्तम् । (v 3339)

Among non-Buddhist writers earlier than Somadeva, Jayanta gives a clear and succinct account of the theory of Nairātmya as part of the Buddhist argument in Nyāyamañjarī (chap 7), and his remarks may be compared with the statements of Śāntaraksita reproduced above and the views cited by Somadeva in Yasastilaka, Book V¹ Jayanta says.

तस्मादुत्सृज्यतामेष मूर्धाभिषिक्त प्रथमो मोह आत्मग्रहो नाम । तन्निवृत्त्या चात्मीयग्रहोऽपि विरस्यति अहमेव न किं ममेति । तदिदमहकारमकारग्रन्थिप्रहाणेन नैरात्म्यदर्शनमेव निर्वाणद्वारमालम्ब्यताम् । तस्य स मार्ग धणिकपदार्थनिश्चय । धणिकेषु हि सर्वभावेषु निराश्रयेषु ज्ञानस्याप्याश्रयविरहात् कुतस्त्यमात्मकल्पनमिति ।

Somadeva, as we have seen, criticizes the Buddhist doctrine of Bhāvanā in Yasastilaka VI 1.¹ An earlier criticism of the doctrine is that of Vidyānanda in Tattvārtha-sloka-vārtika 1 71.

Somadeva gives the following definition of the Buddhist view of salvation in Yasastilaka VI.1 nirāśraya-cittotpatti-lakṣaṇo mokṣaḥ and quotes the two verses ending with kleśa-kṣayāt kevalam eti śāntim.¹ The medieval interpretation of this is found in Vāḍideva Sūri's Pramāṇa-naya-tattvāloka-kāramkāra 2 26

सौगतास्तु केचिन्निराश्रयचित्तसतानोत्पत्तिर्मोक्ष इत्याचक्षते । तत्राविद्यातृष्णाहरितं चित्तं निराश्रयमित्यभिधीयते । अविद्या रागद्वेषाभिलाषः । तृष्णा तु भाविभोगाभिलाषः ।

1 See preceding Chapter.

It will be seen that nirāśraya is explained as free from avidyā (lust and hatred) and trsnā (craving), and the emergence of a stream of consciousness free from these impurities is described as Moksa. This is similar to the ancient teaching that Nirvāna is nothing but the end of klesas (lust, hatred and delusion)

In Yasastilaka, Book V, Somadeva gives another definition of the Buddhist view of salvation. Moksa is here described as Nirodha consisting in the emergence of a state of mind free from the āśravas following the destruction of the notion of the Self¹. Āśrava is an irregular Buddhist Sanskrit form of the Pāli Āsava, there being four āśavas kāmāśava, bhavāśava, diṭṭhāśava and avijjāśava (sensuality, lust for life, speculation and ignorance)². Freedom from the Āśravas, which are generally taken to mean the cravings that produce an intoxicating effect on the mind, constitutes the Buddhist ideal of salvation, known also as Nirodha or cessation. Haribhadra says in Śaddarsana-samuccaya (verse 7) that nirodha is moksa, and Gunaratna in his commentary thereon explains it as a mental state free from the klesas, that is, lust, hatred and delusion. We thus come back to the old conception of the destruction of the klesas, and it is obvious that the two definitions of the Buddhist view of salvation given by Somadeva do not materially differ from each other.

In Buddhist literature, Nirvāna is defined as Nirodha (cessation) in Milindapañha III, 6. It is said that inasmuch as the wise man neither takes pleasure in the senses and in the objects of sense nor continues cleaving to them, "in him craving ceases, and by the cessation of craving grasping ceases, and by the cessation of grasping becoming ceases, and when becoming has ceased birth ceases, and with its cessation old age and death, grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow and despair cease to exist". In this way the cessation of all that aggregation of pain is brought about. "Thus is it that cessation is Nirvāna"³. The end of cravings, the absence of passion, Nirodha and Nirvāna are mentioned together⁴.

There seem to have been at least two conceptions of Buddhist salvation current in the medieval period. The first is the emergence of a stream of consciousness free from all impurities, and corresponds to the view recorded by Somadeva. Kamalaśīla says in his commentary on Tattavasamgraha (verse 151) that the practice of Yoga brings about the disappearance of Avidyā followed by the rise of an undefiled stream of consciousness leading to Apavarga or final release.

तस्याश्चाविद्याया योगा-यासादसमर्थतरतमक्षणोत्पादक्रमेण व्यपगमात् परिशुद्धज्ञानसन्तानोदयादपवर्गप्राप्तिरित्येतौ बन्धनोक्षव्यवस्था युक्तिमती ।

This view is recorded also by Vyomaśīva in the introduction to his commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya, wherein he says that, according to some, the supreme beatitude consists in consciousness, free from the passions, emerging as a result of meditation on Nairātmya and the momentary character of things.

अन्ये तु अस्थिरादिभावनावशात् रागादिवियुक्तज्ञानोत्पत्तिं निश्रेयसमिति मन्यन्ते । तथाहि सर्वं क्षणिकमिति भावयतो विषयेषु आसक्तिर्व्यावर्तते ... । तथा सर्वं निरात्मकमिति भावनाया नाह परं न ममायमिति परिग्रहद्वेषाभावे भवत्येव विशुद्धचित्तसन्तानोत्पत्तिरिति ।

The second view of Buddhist salvation prevalent in the medieval period, although not recorded by Somadeva, is that Mokṣa is nothing but the complete annihilation of the stream of consciousness, comparable to the going out of a lamp. Vāḍideva Sūri (op cit) mentions this view as that of a certain section of Buddhists along with the former doctrine. He says:

अपरे पुनः प्रदीपनिर्वाणवत् सर्वथा चित्तसन्तानोच्छेदो मोक्ष इति सगिरन्ते ।

Vyomaśīva (op cit.) explains it along with the other view:

तथा च पटाद्यर्थस्य प्रतिषेधात् सर्वं शून्यमिति च । एव हि दुःखस्य समुदयनिरोधमार्गेषु विशिष्टज्ञानं निःश्रेयसकारणमिति । तथाहि दुःखरूपादिस्कन्धपञ्चकस्य समुदयकारणम् । 'तयोर्निरोधो विनाशस्तस्योपायो मार्गः' इत्येषु विशिष्टज्ञानवशात् शुद्धचित्तसन्तानतदुच्छेदो वा निश्रेयसमिति युक्तम् ।

The opinion is recorded also by Bhāskara in his Brahmasūtra Bhāṣya 2 2 18.

अथ प्रहृष्टमग्निमुत्ता संवित्संततिर्निर्वातस्थप्रदीपवदोसंस्कारैर्क्षणात् क्षणपरपर्यायवतिष्ठते । संस्कारक्षये सा प्रदीपवदेव निर्वाणमृच्छति । सेयमभावप्राप्तिरपवर्ग इति मन्यन्ते । अपरे तु सन्तत्यविच्छेदमिच्छन्ति ।

Siddharsa (Upamati-bhava-prapañcā kathā, Book IV) and Guṇaratna (comm. on Saḍḍarsana-samuccaya, v. 11) attribute the doctrine in question to the Sautrāntika school of Buddhism.

सौत्रांतिकमतं पुनरिदम् । रूपवेदनाविज्ञानसंज्ञासंस्काराः सर्वशरीरेणामेते पञ्च स्कन्धा विद्यन्ते । न पुनरात्मा । त एव हि परलोकगमिनः । तथा क्षणिका सर्वे संस्काराः ... सन्तानोच्छेदो मोक्ष इति ।

Both the views are mentioned together by Jayanta in Nyāyamañjarī (chap. 9).

निर्वाणादिपदार्थेयमपवर्गं तु सौगता । सन्त्युच्छेदसिच्छन्ति स्वच्छां वा ज्ञानसन्ततिम् ॥

VEDĀNTISTS

The school of Vedānta prevalent in Somadeva's time was the Advaita school, and he records the views of the Vedāntavādins or the Brahmādvaitavādins. He refers to Śamkarācārya, asserting that the Buddha's doctrine was imitated by the latter¹. The allegation that the great philosopher was a Buddhist in disguise seems to have been widely current by the middle of the tenth century. Somadeva appears to have been acquainted with the writings of the school of Śamkara, and his statement of the ultimate goal according to the Brahmādvaitavādins runs thus: 'यथा घटविघटने घटाकाशमाकाशीभवति तथा देहोच्छेदात् सर्वं प्राणी परे ब्रह्मणि लीयते ।' This reminds one of the following verses of Śamkara's Sarva-vedānta-siddhāntasāra-samgraha:

घटाभावे घटाकाशो महाकाशो यथा तथा । उपाध्यभावे त्वात्मैव स्वयं ब्रह्मैव केवलम् ॥ 695

Sureśvarācārya says in his Nāṣkarmyasiddhi II 68.

यथा विशुद्ध आकाशे सहसैवाभ्रमण्डलम् । भूत्वा विलीयते तद्वदात्मनीहाखिलं जगत् ॥

The doctrine of the Vedānta recorded by Somadeva is summed up also in the following verse quoted in the Mātharavṛtti on Sāmkhyā-lārikā (39).

देहे मोहाश्रये भजे युक्तः स परमात्मनि । कुम्भाकाश इवाकाशे लभते चैकरूपताम् ॥

ŚAIVAS

An interesting feature of Somadeva's treatment of Śaiva doctrines is the light thrown by it on the controversy between the Śaivas and the Jainas on the subject of omniscience and creation². The first is claimed by the Śaivas for Śiva or Maheśvara, while it is reserved by the Jainas for their Arhat, and as for creation, attributed by the Śaivas to Śiva, it is altogether denied by the other sect. The roots of this controversy go to earlier times, and that it is older than the middle of the tenth century is certain. Vidyānanda who belongs to the ninth century tries to refute Śamkara-mata, Śaiva doctrine, in his *Āptaparīkṣā*³, and rejects the claim of Maheśvara to be regarded as the creator of the universe and the omniscient author of a system teaching the way to salvation (mokṣa-mārga). It will be out of place to analyse his argument; but in dealing with this topic Vidyānanda and Somadeva supplement each other and record valuable information on the subject. Vidyānanda's views are partially refuted by Anantavīrya in his commentary on Mānikyanandi's Parīksāmulhasūtra (Pratyaksoddesa),¹ and it may be pointed out that most of our knowledge of the Śaiva-Jaina controversy is derived from Jaina works.

The background of the controversy between the Śaivas and the Jainas mentioned above is provided by Kumārila's well-known attack on the conception of an Omniscient Being, and the questions involved are part of a larger issue which brought several schools of thought into the arena of philosophical controversy. Kumārila regarded omniscience as something impossible, and instead of positing an omniscient author of the Vedas, he maintained that they were eternal and not the composition of a personal author. Kumārila's views may be studied in S'lohavārtika (Codanāsūtra) and specially in the verses quoted from him by Śāntaraksita in the last section of Tattvasamgraha, many of them being not found in the extant S'lohavārtika. It is important to note that Kumārila in the course of his argument insisted on the absurdity of the Buddhist and Jaina notions that the Buddha and the Arhat respectively were Omniscient Beings. The Buddhist reply to this is elaborately given by Śāntaraksita in Tattvasamgraha, and the earliest Jaina reply to Kumārila is probably that of Akalamka (8th century) in his Nyāyavivṛtī (chap. 3). Kumārila, for example, had written in S'lohavārtika (2 141, 142)

एव यैः केवलं ज्ञानमिन्द्रियाद्यनपेक्षिण । सूक्ष्मातीतादिविषय जीवस्य परिकल्पितम् ॥
नर्तते तदागमात् सिध्येन्न च तेनागमो विना । दृष्टान्तोऽपि न तन्नागमो नृषु कश्चित् प्रवर्तते ॥

Akalamka replied to this as follows in Nyāyavivṛtī (vv. 412, 413)

एवं यत् केवलज्ञानमनुमानविजृम्भितम् । नर्तते तदागमात् सिध्येन्न च तेन विनागमः ॥
सत्यमर्थबलादेव पुरुषातिशयो मतः । प्रभव पौरुषेयोऽस्य प्रबन्धोऽनादिरिष्यते ॥

Not only Akalamka but other Jaina scholars have tried to refute Kumārila's views, and this explains the large number of quotations from Kumārila found in later Jaina philosophical literature, e g, in Vidyānanda's Aptaparīksā, Astasahasri and Tattvārtha-sloka-vārtika (under sūtra 1 29), Abhayadeva's commentary on Sammattatarka, Nyāya-kumuda-candra and other works. The bitterness of the Jainas against the Mīmāṃsā school for attacking their fundamental doctrine of the Omniscient Being is shown in Siddharsi's Upamati-bhava-prapañcā-kathā (chap. 4), which declares that the Mīmāṃsā is not a philosophical system at all, and after enumerating six non-Jaina systems including the Mīmāṃsā, Siddharsi excludes the latter from the field of speculative thought, although he finds room for the materialistic

1 'यच्च महेश्वरस्य क्लेशादिभिरपरावृष्टत्वं निन्दित्वैतन्महेश्वर्योऽप्येतत् तत् सर्वमपि गगनाब्जसौरमव्यावर्णनमिव निर्विषयत्वा-

Lokāyata system¹ There is no trace of any such bitterness against the Mimāṃsā in Somadeva's Yas'astilaka, as we find here the Śaivas replacing the Mimāṃsakas as adversaries of Jaina doctrines

The controversy about omniscience was further complicated by the Naiyāyikas entering the lists in defence of the doctrine. Like the Buddhists and the Jainas, they upheld the theory of omniscience as against the Mimāṃsakas, and we find, for instance, Jayanta quoting and criticising Kumārila's views in his Nyāyamañjarī (chap 2) and establishing the theory that the adepts in Yoga possess the unhampered faculty of pure and universal knowledge² The Naiyāyikas, however, declare God to be the omniscient creator of the universe and the author of the Vedas. Vātsyāyana, indeed, attributes the authorship of the Vedas to 'trustworthy persons' (Āptāḥ) in his Bhāṣya on Nyāyasūtras 2 1. 68, and does not say that God is their author. Uddyotakara in his Nyāyavārtika calls the author of the Vedas a superior individual (Purusa-viśesa), which might mean God, this being the designation applied to God in Yogasūtras 1 24. The later exponents of the Nyāya system, Jayanta, Vācaspati and Udayana, however, maintain that the omniscient God is the creator of the universe as well as the author of the Vedas Jayanta, for example, says in his Nyāyamañjarī (chap 4):

कर्ता य एव जगतामखिलात्मवृत्तिकर्मप्रपञ्चपरिपाकविविचित्रताश्च ।

विश्वात्मना तदुपदेशपराः प्रणीतास्तेनैव वेदरचना इति युक्तमेतत् ॥

The Mimāṃsā objections to the Nyāya conception of an omniscient Creator are fully stated in Mandana's Vidhuvveka (P 210 ff)³ A later writer Śālikānātha, an authoritative exponent of the Prābhākara school of Mimāṃsā, tries to refute the theory of the omniscience of God in Praharanapañcikā (chap. 7). He argues that it is the cycle of tradition (vṛddha-paramparā), without any beginning, that fixes the meaning of words and not the significance supposed to be attached to them by God at the beginning of creation. Further, the idea of personal authorship is not compatible with the authoritative character of the Veda which deals with supernormal things⁴ Śālikānātha probably belongs to the tenth century,⁵ but in this century the position of the Nyāya-vaśeśika school was so strong that 5 G. N. Kaviraja; Introduction to Kusumāñjali (Sarasvatī Bhavana Texts).

Mīmāṃsā theories were not likely to wield any great influence. Be that as it may, having established the existence of an Omniscient Being, the Naiyāyikas turn against the Buddhists and the Jainas, and deny that the Buddha or the Arhat can ever be called omniscient, and their attitude, on the whole, is one of hostility towards the non-Brahmanical systems. Vācaspati says in his Nyāyavārtika-tātparyā-ṭīkā that Buddha and Rṣabha are known to be the authors of the Buddhist and Jaina scriptures respectively, but as they are not the creators of the universe, like God, how can they be regarded as omniscient?¹ In his commentary on the Yogasūtra Bhāṣya also (1 24, 25) he rejects the claims of the founders of systems like the Buddha, the Arhat, Kapila and others to be regarded as omniscient beings. Further, the Naiyāyikas just mentioned give a new turn to the old Nyāya theory that the Vedas are authoritative, because they are the utterances of a trustworthy person (Āpta), and argue therefrom that the Vedas are the utterances of a Trustworthy Being, because they are accepted by the majority of the people (mahājana), and what is not declared by a Trustworthy Being is not accepted by the majority of the people. This is exactly what Udayana says in the Kiraṇāvalī commentary on the Prāśastapāda Bhāṣya.² Jayanta also says that it is possible to speak of anything as being declared by a Trustworthy Being (Āpta) only when it is well-known among and accepted by the majority of the people.³ He explains Mahājana to be the great mass or the majority as those who follow the Varṇāśrama order prevalent in the Aryan country, that is, the Vedic order of society founded on the division of castes and the stages of life, and makes a distinction between Mahājana and Vrnda, the group or the minority, such as the Buddhists. The latter might claim their vrnda to be the mahājana in order to establish the authoritative character of their scriptures, but it is not possible to raise a minority (Vrnda) to the status of a majority (Mahājana), and the latter always avoids and never approves any scriptures that are opposed to the Vedas.⁴ Jayanta therefore concludes that scriptures other than the Vedas cannot be regarded as being composed by a trustworthy individual, because they lack support among the large mass of the people.⁵

5 'अत एव विधाय महाजनप्रसिद्धिरागमान्तरेष्वदर्शनात् तेषामाप्तप्रणीतत्वम् ।'

Similarly, Vācaspati in his Tātparyatīkā, makes a sharp distinction between the Vedas and the scriptures of the Buddhists, the Digambara Jainas and others, and observes that no scriptures other than the Vedas are accepted by the majority of the people and mentioned as being composed by God. The Vedas alone, composed by God as they are, maintain the entire social order and provide instruction in the means to attain the good and shun the evil. On the contrary, the teachings of the Buddha and others do not uphold the social order, nor are they accepted by the great mass of the people. Owing to this general reproach, they are followed only by a few barbarians, vilest among men and just like animals, and hence it is impossible to regard such teachings as being propounded by any trustworthy individual.¹

It will be seen that the arguments of the Naiyāyikas are not only directed against the non-Brahmanical systems as such but against the Jain conception of the Arhat as the omniscient and trustworthy guide. They seem to put forward a rival Āpta theory to discredit that of the Jainas, and thus reinforce the Śaivas in their attack on the fundamental Jain doctrine of the omniscient Arhat. It is difficult to determine the chronological relations of the Śaivas and the Naiyāyikas, but they might represent a parallel movement. Vācaspati and Jayanta belong to the ninth century and Udayana to the tenth, and we have seen that the Śaiva-Jaina controversy recorded by Vidyānanda and Somadeva falls in the same period. Further, as Haribhadra tells us in Saddarsanasamuccaya, the Naiyāyikas were generally Śaivas, and we know, in fact, that the leading Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika philosophers of the period of revival, Bhāsarvajña, Jayanta, Udayana, and Vyomaśiva were all Śaivas. It is also noteworthy that the Naiyāyikas often identify God (Īśvara) with Śiva or Maheśvara. Jayanta does so in Nyāyamañjarī (chap 3),² while Bhāsarvajña says in Nyāyasāra that salvation is the outcome of the vision of Śiva.³ The verse saṁvayānātā trptā anādibodhaḥ... sadāhuraṅgāni Maheśvarasya cited by the Śaivas to illustrate the greatness of Śiva is quoted by Udayana in Nyāyakusumāṅga (Book V) in support of the argument for the existence of God, and Udayana's own lines at the end of Book I may be compared with some of the doctrinal verses of the Śaiva school quoted in the preceding chapter. The identity of Śiva with Īśvara seems to have been an accepted fact, and as late as the twelfth century Vādideva Sūri freely uses the term Śiva and its equivalents in his detailed criticism of the Nyāya conception of God in Pramāna-naya-tattvālokāmlāra 2 26 But in spite of the affinities between the Śaivas and the Nyāya school, the former had an independent system with doctrines of their own, and while the Nyāya school maintained that God was the author of the Vedas, the Śaivas attributed their Śāstras to the omniscient Śiva, and claimed that the Vedas, too, were created by him It is noteworthy that the Īśānasvāgurudevapaddhati (Kriyāpāda, chap I) quotes various Śaiva texts to prove that Śiva is not only the author of the Śaiva Āgamas but of the Vedas¹ The claim was not probably repugnant to the Naiyāyikas who were, generally speaking, Śaivas, and the interconnection of the two schools accounts for the fact that the Īśānasvāgurudevapaddhati (op cit) quotes a well-known verse of Jayanta's Nyāyamañjarī,² declaring Parameśvara (God) to be the author of the Vedas, in support of the Śaiva claim that Śiva was their author.

SĀMKHYAS

We have reproduced Somadeva's criticism of Sāmkhya doctrines in the preceding chapter, and may here cite another criticism of Sāmkhya views by a Jaina writer, Devasena, a senior contemporary of Somadeva, who wrote his Dasasanasāra at Dhārā in 933 A D³ He says in his Bhāvasamgraha that according to the Sāmkhya system, Prakṛi does everything and the Self is subject to neither virtue nor sin this is a negation of moral responsibility and leads to vice and corruption The Sāmkhyas, according to Devasena, are addicted to worldly pleasures, consummate drunkards, and devoid of compassion for living creatures, they are given to stealing, reject virtue, and indulge in evil practices

एए विसयासत्ता कग्गुमत्ता य जीवदयरहिया । परतियधणहरणरया अनहियधम्मा दुरायारा ॥ १८० ॥

With this view of Sāmkhya philosophy may be compared that of Āsuri in the episode of Candakarman in Yasastilaka towards the end of Book

V.¹ The evidence of Devasena and Somadeva points to the fact that there may have been some degeneration in the moral tone of the Sāmkhyas in their time, but the ethical ideal of the Sāmkhya school is manifest from the conception of the Sāttvika from of Buddhi, as propounded in Sāmkhyakārikā (23) As regards the charge that the Sāmkhyas are devoid of compassion for living creatures, it is belied by their view that animal slaughter in Vedic sacrifices is productive of sin, a point elaborated in the Mātharavrtti. It is noteworthy that the Jaina Gunaratna Sūri tells us in his commentary on Haribhadra's Śaddarsanasamuccaya (chap 3) that the Sāmkhyas are spiritualists averse to the Vedic cult involving killing of animals, and he mentions in this connection certain devices adopted by them to avoid injury to living creatures, similar to those used by the Jaina monks. Somadeva, on the other hand, classes the Sāmkhyas with the Buddhists, the Cārvākas, and the adherents of the Vedic, Śaiva, and medical systems, and advises people to abstain from flesh-eating by rejecting the views of all these schools (Yasastilaka VII. 24 Vol II, p 331)

तच्छाक्यसांख्यचार्वाकवेदवैद्यकपर्दिनाम् । मतं विहाय हातव्य मांसं श्रेयोऽर्थिभिः सदा ॥

Obviously the systems mentioned above permitted the eating of animal food, and the Sāmkhya attitude towards flesh-eating may have been similar to that of the Buddhists, in spite of the repugnance to the slaughter of animals, common to both schools.² Somadeva, as we shall see, condemns the Buddhists for eating flesh, and this is probably the reason why Devasena likewise describes the Sāmkhyas as devoid of compassion for living creatures.

BĀRHASPATYAS

The Bārhaspatyas, as we have seen, are called Nāstikas by Somadeva, and in Yasastilaka, Book V, Candakarman who expounds their views is described as an exponent of Lokāyata doctrines.³ Siddharsī says in his Upamati-bhava-prapañcā kathā that the Bārhaspatyas are the inhabitants of the Lokāyata City.⁴ That the Lokāyata was a prominent system in the tenth century and thereabouts is certain. Siddharsī includes it among the principal non-Jaina systems described by him in his allegorical romance (Book IV); and in the Kudlur Plates of the Ganga king Mārasimha, dated 963 A. D., a famous Jaina teacher is described as Lokāyata-loka-sammata-matih, 'one whose talents are appreciated by the adherents of the Lokāyata system.' The views of the Bārhaspatya school are discussed by Vimuktātman in Istasiddhi VII. 18,¹ a work composed between 850 and 1050 A. D.²

In spite of frequent references to the Lokāyatikas or the Cārvākas, as they are popularly called, in Indian philosophical literature, no systematic work of this school has come down to us, which we can point out as the source of the statements of Somadeva and other scholars who have dealt with Lokāyata doctrines. That there was a work called the Bārhaspatya Sūtra seems certain and possibly it was quite brief. Bhāskara in his Brahmasūtra Bhāṣya 3 3 53 refers, like Śamkara, to the Lokāyatikas, and quotes some aphorisms of the Bārhaspatya school. He says

तथा बार्हस्पत्यानि सूत्राणि—पृथिव्यप्तेजो वायुरिति तत्त्वानि, तत्समुदाये शरीरेन्द्रियविषयसङ्गा, तेभ्यश्चैतन्यं, किण्वदिभ्यो मदशक्तिवद्विज्ञानमिति ।

The first three of the aphorisms cited above are reproduced also in Vidyānanda's Tattvārtha-sloka-vārtika 1. 104 with slight variations

पृथिव्यापस्तेजो वायुरिति तत्त्वानि, तत्समुदाय शरीरेन्द्रियसङ्गाविषय, तेभ्यश्चैतन्यम् ।

Bhāskara and Vidyānanda are assigned to the ninth century, and it may be assumed that the Bārhaspatya Sūtras were current in their time. In addition to the Sūtras quoted by them, the following Lokāyata aphorisms and dicta are cited in Kamalaśīla's commentary on Śāntaraksita's Tattvasaṃgraha (vv. 1858, 1872):

तथाहि तस्यैतत् सूत्रम्—‘परलोकिनोऽभावात् परलोकभाव’ इति । तथाहि—‘पृथिव्यापस्तेजो वायुरिति चत्वारि तत्त्वानि, तेभ्यश्चैतन्यम्’ इति । तत्र केचिद्वृत्तिकारं व्याचक्षते—उत्पद्यते तेभ्यश्चैतन्यम्, अन्ये अभिव्यज्यत इत्याहुः । (Under v. 1858).

यथोक्तम्—‘एतावानेव पुरुषो यावानिन्द्रियगोचर’ तथा ‘पुनरुक्तदेशान्तर कालान्तरमवस्थान्तर वा परलोक’ इति । (Under v. 1872)

Śāntaraksita quotes a Lokāyata aphorism in verse 1864 and attributes it to Kambalāśvatara

कायादेव ततो ज्ञानं प्राणापानाद्यधिष्ठितात् । युक्तं जायत इत्येतत् कम्बलाश्वतरोदितम् ॥

Kamalaśīla remarks तथा च सूत्रम्—कायादेवेति । कम्बलाश्वतरोदितमिति. As pointed out by G. N. Kaviraj,³ S'āṃhara Bhāṣya on the Vedāntasūtras 3 3 53 cites the following Lokāyata aphorisms ‘तेभ्यश्चैतन्यम्’ ‘मदशक्तिवद्विज्ञानम्’ ‘चैतन्यविशिष्टं कायं पुरुष’, and Sadānanda in Advanta-brahma-siddhi cites two more ‘काम एवैकं पुरुषार्थः’ ‘मरणमेवापवर्गः’. It will be seen that the followers of the Lokāyata school recognise four elements only, but Gunaratna tells us in his commentary on the relevant section of Haribhadra's Saddarśanasamuccaya that certain among them include Ākāśa as the fifth element. In Yasastilaka VIII. 37¹ Somadeva mentions only four elements in connection with the system of Brhaspati, who is described as attributing consciousness to earth, air, water and fire, but not to the Self²

Apart from aphorisms, a collection of verses containing Lokāyata doctrines seems to have long existed, and such verses are occasionally met with in Indian philosophical literature. One such verse, namely, is cited by Candrakīrti (6th century) in his commentary on Nāgārjuna's Mūla-madhyamaka-kārikās (Chap 18), while this as well as an accompanying verse³ is quoted in Haribhadra's Saddarśanasamuccaya (vv 81, 82). A Lokāyata verse is quoted also by Somadeva in Yasastilaka, Book V, p 253

यावज्जीवेत् सुख जीवेन्नस्ति मृत्योरगोचर । भस्मीभूतस्य शान्तस्य पुनरागमनं कुत ॥

It is an oft-quoted verse and cited among earlier writers by Jayanta in Nyāyamañjarī (Chap 7).

Among early works the famous Mahāyāna text Saddharmapundarikā, prior to the third century A D., alludes to the Lokāyata system at least twice,⁴ while the interesting summary of Lokāyata views in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra is reproduced by Somadeva in Yasastilaka, Book IV, P 92⁵. Bāṇa in his Kādambarī refers to the teachings of the system as promoting sinful tendencies,⁶ while in Harsacarita, Book VIII, the Lokāyatikas are mentioned among the adherents of diverse schools of thought who studied and taught in the hermitage of Divākaramitra in the Vindhya forest

Somadeva's discussion of Lokāyata views in Yasastilaka, Books V and VI, is an important contribution to our knowledge of the subject

6 'लोकायतिकविद्ययेवाधर्मरुचे'

Among his literary predecessors Haribhadra gives an interesting exposition of the doctrines of the school in Samarāṅga-kahā, Book III, in the dialogue between the Jaina teacher Vijayasimha and a Nāstikavādīn¹ Similarly, in a story in Vasudevahindī, Book IV, a king named Kurucandra is introduced as a Nāstikavādīn, whose views are briefly described² Jayanta says in Nyāyamañjarī (chap. 4) that the Lokāyata is mere casuistry and not an authoritative system, as it does not inculcate any duty,³ but he takes care to expound the tenets of the school at the beginning of Chap. 7, and towards the end of the same chapter calls the Cārvākas susikṣita, well-trained, describing and refuting their views.

NAIYĀYIKAS

While enumerating the theories of salvation put forward by the different schools of thought, Somadeva does not refer to the Naiyāyikas, obviously because their view of mokṣa does not differ from that of the Vaiśeṣikas which is defined by him as the complete cessation of the specific attributes of the soul⁴ Somadeva says 'ज्ञानसुखदुःखेच्छाद्वेषप्रयत्नधर्माधर्मसंस्काराणां नवसंख्या-वसराणामात्मगुणानामत्यन्तोत्सुक्तिमुक्ति' इति काण्वादाः । With this may be compared the statement of Jayanta defining the Nyāya conception of salvation in Nyāyamañjarī (Chap. 9): नवानामात्मगुणानां बुद्धिसुखदुःखेच्छाद्वेषप्रयत्नधर्माधर्मसंस्काराणां निर्मूलोच्छेदोऽपवर्ग इत्युक्तं भवति । Jayanta goes on to say:

इच्छाद्वेषप्रयत्नादि भोगायतनबन्धनम् । उच्छिन्नभोगायतनो नात्मा तैरपि युज्यते ॥

ननु तस्यामवस्थायां कीदृगात्मावशिष्यते । स्वरूपैकप्रतिष्ठानं परित्यक्तोऽखिलैर्गुणैः ॥

Somadeva seems to refer to the Nyāya theory of salvation in a verse addressed to the Arhat in Yasastilaka VIII 39 (Vol. II, p. 396):

सुसुप्तदीपनिर्वाणे प्राकृते वा त्वयि स्फुटम् । सुसुप्तदीपनिर्वाणं प्राकृतं स्याज्जगन्नयम् ॥

The verse refers to three types of salvation kha-nurvāna, sky-like salvation, supta-nurvāna, sleep-like salvation, and dipa-nurvāna, salvation like the going out of a lamp According to a marginal note in Ms. A, dipa-nurvāna refers to the Buddhist view, supta-nurvāna to the Sāṃkhya view (because, according to that system, the emancipated Self, although conscious, perceives nothing); and kha-nurvāna to the Nyāya view, because, as we have seen, the Naiyāyikas believe mokṣa to be a colourless condition like that of the sky, in which the Self exists bereft of all attributes ¹

It may be noted that there is another conception of salvation different from the usual Nyāya view, and associated with the name of Bhāsarvajña, an important writer of the Nyāya school, assigned to about the middle of the tenth century. It is probable that Somadeva, like Śrīharsa, who also refers to the Nyāya doctrine of salvation in Naisadhacarita 17 75, was either not acquainted with the views of Bhāsarvajña or perhaps ignored them in his treatment of the current theories of salvation ²

PĀŚUPATAS

Somadeva describes and criticises the procedure recommended by the Pāśupatas for the attainment of salvation, but he does not tell us anything about the kind of mokṣa contemplated by them. The Pāśupata conception of salvation, according to certain writers, is not different from that of the Nyāya school. This requires some explanation.

Śamkara in his Bhāṣya on the Vedāntasūtras 2 2. 37 criticises the doctrines of the Pāśupatas, but he refers to them simply as Māheśvaras, followers of the system propounded by Śiva.³ The Pāśupatas were a Śaiva sect, and we know that there were four Śaiva sects in the ninth century, as both Vācaspati and Bhāskara refer to them, the former in his Bhāmātī and the latter in his Brahmasūtra Bhāṣya 2. 2 37. The four sects are Śaivas, Pāśupatas, Kāpālikas and Kāiunika-siddhāntins, the latter being called Kāthaka-siddhāntins by Bhāskara. The four-fold division of the Śaiva sects is found also in Yāmūnācārya's Āgamaprāmānya (latter half of the eleventh century), but here the names given are Śaivas, Pāśupatas, Kāpālikas and Kālāmukhas. This classification is followed in Rāmānuja's S'ribhāṣya.

- 1 Applied to the Arhat, the epithet is explained as रागद्वेषमोहरहितत्वाद् आकाशवत् शून्यं योग निद्रावा सुप्तं दीपवत् केवलज्ञानेन चोत्तमम्
 - 2 See the English translation of Naisadhacarita of Śrīharsa, Appendix I, P. 497 ff.
 - 3 According to Śamkara, the Māheśvaras believe in five categories Kārya, Kāraṇa, Yoga, vidhī, and duḥkhhānta, which are all Pāśupata tenets. Cf. Āgamaprāmānya तत्रैवा पाशुपतप्रक्रिया । तत्र पञ्च पदार्थास्तु व्याख्याता कारणादयः । कारण कार्यं विधिर्योगो दुःखान्तः ॥ Vācaspati in Bhāmātī explains Māheśvaras as referring to the four Śaiva sects including the Pāśupatas, but his interpretation of yoga and vidhī is based on Pāśupata texts. He says योगोऽर्थोकारादिध्यानधारणादि । विधिस्त्रिषवणस्नानादिर्गूढचर्यावसानः, with which may be compared the following Pāśupata sūtras: भस्मना त्रिषवणं स्नायीत । 1. 2, गूढव्रतं गूढप्रवित्रवाणि 4. 2. 3, ओंकारमभिध्यायीत, हृदि कुर्वीत धारणाम् । 5. 24, 25.

We learn from Bhāskara (op. cit.) that the Pāśupatas and the Kāpālikas hold the same view of salvation as the Vaiśeṣikas and the Naiyāyikas, that is, suppose the emancipated Self to be divested of all specific attributes, resembling a block of stone¹ As for the Śaivas, their conception of mokṣa is said to be identical with that of the Sāṃkhyas, that is, according to them, the emancipated Self subsists in a pristine condition of pure consciousness Bhāskara says पाशुपतवैशेषिकनैयायिककापालिकानामविशिष्टा मुक्त्यवस्थाया पाषाणकल्पा आत्मानो भवन्तीति । साख्यशैवयोश्च विशिष्टा आत्मानश्चैतन्यस्वभावास्तिष्ठन्तीति । Yāmunācārya, who gives an account of the Śaiva sects in his Āgamaprāmāṇya, offers the same interpretation of the Pāśupata conception of salvation as Bhāskara He explains duḥkhānta, one of the fundamental tenets of the Pāśupata system, as absolute cessation of pain, and states that the Pāśupatas regard this as mukti, a condition characterized by the annihilation of the entire range of the specific attributes of the Self अत्यन्तिकी दुःखनिवृत्तिर्दुःखान्तशब्देनोक्ता तामेव नि शेष-वैशेषिकात्मगुणोच्छेदलक्षणा मुक्तिं मन्यन्ते । Duḥkhānta is in fact the apex of the Pāśupata system As explained in the Ratna commentary on the Ganakārikā (p 9), in a negative sense, duḥkhānta is absolute cessation of all pain, while, in a positive sense, it corresponds to siddhi or the possession of supernatural power like that of Śiva Siddhi is of two kinds jñānasakti or the potency of knowledge and Kṛyāsakti or the potency of action, which has three aspects extraordinary speed, the power to assume shapes at will, and boundless might with the body and the organs intact The attainment of the twofold siddhi is followed by ten other siddhis or miraculous powers² for example, absolute freedom, irresistible knowledge, freedom from risk to life, complete fearlessness, freedom from the effects of old age and from the pangs of death, lack of all hindrances, overlordship etc The Pāśupata system thus lays great stress on the attainment of supernormal powers, but siddhi does not stand alone, as it belongs to a group of five lābhas or ways of perfection recognised by the school, the others being jñāna, tapas, ratyatva and sthiti Jñāna is knowledge of the truths. Tapas is dharma or discipline produced by the observance of practices such as bhasmasnāna The Ratna commentary declares that the devotee is misled from the right path by the thief Adharma and protected by Dharma acting like a city magistrate (prapāla). The power of Dharma (dharmasakti) is revealed in the devotee's strength of mind which is not perturbed even by the songs and music of a Rambhā. Nityatva is constant devotion to the deity. Sthiti is firm concentration of the mind free from impurities on Rudra. The Pāsupata seems to have been a system of religious discipline rather than a school of speculative thought.

Kaundinya's commentary on the Pāsupata Sūtras gives a fuller picture of the moral discipline of the Pāsupata school at an early stage of its evolution. It is based on the yamas or modes of self-restraint, viz., ahimsā, brahmacarya, satya, asamvyavahāra, saucha, āhārālāghava and apramāda.

Ahimsā is non-injury which is almost as comprehensive as that of the Jainas. Even the lighting of fire is forbidden to avoid hurting sentient beings. Water should be filtered before use through a cloth or a strainer to keep out tiny creatures. Edible vegetable-stalks, growing bulbs and ripe seeds are to be shunned for similar reasons.¹ Ahimsā, in short, is avoidance of injury to all forms of life by any process, mental, vocal or physical. The Bhāṣya of Kaundinya quotes the following verse, which declares ahimsā to be superior to the gift of the golden mount of Meru or the entire earth or the ocean full of jewels.

It is interesting to note that Somadeva has a verse on the same subject in Yasastilaka, Book IV (p. 97), which appears to be a variation of the verse cited above.

यो दद्यात् काञ्चनं मेरु कृत्स्नं चापि वसुंधराम् । एकस्य जीवितं दद्यात् फलेन न समं भवेत् ॥

Brahmacarya or chastity does not require any explanation. Satya is speaking the truth. Kaundinya quotes in this connection a verse which declares that even a falsehood uttered in mercy to all creatures leads to heaven, but not the truth, which being spoken results in the destruction of the good.² Asamvyavahāra is keeping aloof from commercial transactions and the royal court. Asteya is abstention from stealing which includes anadhikāra-pratigraha (acquisition of property) and anupālambha (swindling money out of others). Akrodha is forbearance. Gurusūśrūṣā is serving one's teacher with devotion. Saucha is purity, physical, mental and spiritual. Physical impurities are removed by the use of holy ashes. More important is bhāvasaucha or purity of thoughts. Ātmasaucha or spiritual purity is effected by submission to humiliation, insult and opprobrium. Āhāralāghava is temperance in eating which follows from the injunction to live on alms. Apramāda is constant vigilance in the practice of self-restraint.

1 Flesh food is permitted provided it does not involve killing, and is lawfully acquired. It is permissible to eat, for instance, the flesh of wild boars and buffaloes. See Kaundinya on Pāsupata Sūtras 5.16.

2 स्वर्गमनुतेन गच्छति दयार्थमुक्तेन सर्वभूतानाम् । सत्येनापि न गच्छति सता विनाशार्थमुक्तेन ॥

The early Pāśupatas appear to have led an austere life without any fixed abode and worldly ties. According to the Pāśupata Sūtras, the devotee lives in a deserted house or a cave or even on a cremation ground (5. 9, 30). He wears a single piece of cloth and, if possible, dispenses with clothing altogether as a token of renunciation of all possessions (1. 10, 11). It is, however, doubtful if in later times such rules were strictly followed. The Pāśupata mendicant is enjoined to live on alms, and according to Kaundinya, even the holy ashes should be obtained by begging. This appears to be conditioned by the rule of ahimsā which prohibits the kindling of a fire.¹ The Pāśupata contempt for Vedic sacrifices was a natural consequence of the principle of ahimsā.²

Yoga is preliminary to emancipation. Kaundinya frequently defines yoga as connection of the individual soul with Īśvara, and the Pāśupata system, in fact, inculcates a process of Yogic discipline (yogavādhā), as mentioned in the opening Sūtra. The devotee assiduously observes the essential religious practices,³ adores Mahādeva with wholehearted and constant devotion, and cultivates the yamas or the different kinds of self-restraint. He contemplates the sacred formulas and practises meditation this is kṛyāyoga. With his mind diverted from the objects of sense, he is ripe for the real yoga, that feeling of the self as the self, directed towards Maheśvara as the ultimate goal.⁴ Supernatural powers of vision, hearing, thought-reading and knowledge come to the Siddha who has attained perfection in Yoga. The Siddha attains supernormal qualities like omniscience, speed like that of the mind etc., and these are called gunadharmas, the possession of supreme faculties like those of Maheśvara obtained through His favour.⁵ The Siddhis or supreme attainments, which are also guṇas, are finally acquired by the devotee. All creatures come under his control, but he is not subject to the control of any, he dominates the minds of all, but he is not subject to similar domination; he has the power of life and death over others, but he is not subject to any such power; he is free from fear, and his power suffers no diminution; he conquers old age and death. Endowed with the Siddhis, the aspirant becomes the Mahāganapati or the associate of Mahādeva.¹

Fervent devotion to Rudra in this life and intimate association with Him in the life beyond is the goal set before the Pāsupata devotee. The highest Yoga is absorbed concentration on the supreme Rudra, discarding shape and form. This aspect of the deity is called vāgvisuddha 'one that transcends the range of speech'.² The devotee, in his turn, becomes dharmātman or the embodiment of dharma as revealed in the process of discipline starting with the yamas and culminating in mahātmya or that constancy of soul which enables him to devote himself to the religious life.³ Thus endowed, he attains rudra-sāyujya or direct association with Rudra.⁴ It is clear that the devotee does not merge his identity in the godhead, as we are told that, 'having gone near Rudra' by the prescribed method, the Brāhmana never returns, that is, he is released from the cycle of births.⁵ But, before such a consummation is reached, it is essential to destroy the root cause of the dosas or evils. The evils are the various forms of sense experience which lead to lust, wrath, greed, desire, hatred and the rest. Further, the objects of worldly endeavour are also evils on account of the misery caused by their acquisition, preservation and loss, the discontent produced by the insatiable desire for more and more of them, and injury to others involved in their acquisition and enjoyment. The root cause of the evils is stated to be adharma, which causes mental distraction and makes the devotee incapable of living the full religious life.⁶

Once the mind, free from the dosas, is established in its pristine purity and concentrated on Rudra, the devotee reaches the next higher stage. Dharma and Adharma have ceased to operate, and actions and the means thereof are practically non-existent; the Sādhaka stands alone (eka) above the physical plane with his mind fixed on Rudra. Adharma, the chief obstacle to Yoga, is no longer active, and the Sādhaka, free from the śoṣas, stands like a man who has traversed a forest, he is lśemin with his mind concentrated on Rudra. All actions have ceased, and he is devoid of activity, he is sat with his mind firmly devoted to Rudra. All thoughts relating to pursuits of good and evil have ceased, and the Sādhaka is now vītasoka, free from anxious thoughts¹

Having reached this stage, the unerring devotee comes to the end of all forms of pain and misery through the grace of Maheśvara² This is duḥkhānta, but it is not a negative condition, as pointed out by Kaundinya. For emancipation is not merely absolute cessation of all forms of misery but the attainment of gūnas or excellences, that is, the supernormal powers which figure so prominently in the Pāśupata system.³

It will be seen that the interpretation of the Pāśupata view of salvation as a condition devoid of the specific attributes of the soul, put forward by later writers like Bhāskara and Yāmuna Muni, finds no support in the Pāśupata Sūtras and Kaundinya's commentary. The latter clearly states that, while in the Sāṃkhya-Yoga view the emancipated beings abide in a condition similar to a swoon without the knowledge of self and others, the Mukta in the Pāśupata view is fully endowed with knowledge.⁴ The Pāśupatas were, however, a very widely spread sect, and it is possible that there were adherents of the school who held views similar to those recorded by Bhāskara and Yāmuna Muni.

The Pāśupata system is honourably mentioned along with the Vedas, Sāṃkhya, Yoga, and Pāñcarātra in the following verse cited by Aparāditya (12th century) in his commentary on Yājñavalkya Smṛti 8. 7 साख्य योग पाञ्चरात्र वेदाः पाशुपतं तथा । अतिप्रमाणाभ्युत्थानि हेतुभिर्न विचारयेत् ॥ इति अदृश्यत्वेन हेत्वविचारणीयत्वेन च देवीपुराणयोगवाङ्मन्ययोरदृश्यत्वेन तस्य स्मरणात्

There is no doubt that the Pāśupatas continued to be an influential sect till as late as the twelfth century. They as well as the Śaivas regarded God (i. e. Śiva or Paśupati) as the efficient cause of the universe, unlike the Bhāgavatas or Pāñcarātras who regarded Vāsudeva, the Supreme Soul, as both the efficient and the material cause of the universe, as pointed out by Śaṅkara in his Bhāṣya on the Vedāntasūtras 2. 2. 37, 42. (op cit.) gives the following definition of the theistic conception of the Śaivas and the Pāsupatas, and calls it bhedasvara-vāda तथा च शैवा — प्रधानपुरुष-योरधिष्ठाता केवलं निमित्तकारणमीश्वर इतरेतरविलक्षणा प्रधानपुरुषेश्वर इति भेदेश्वरवादिन ।पाशुपता पुन. कार्यकारणयोगविधिदु खान्ता पञ्च पदार्था पशुपतिनेश्वरेण पशुपाशविमोचनार्थमुद्दिष्टा इति भेदेश्वरवादमेवाङ्गीकुर्वन्ति

The Pāsupatas as a Śaiva sect were in conflict with the Jainas. They are, for instance, mentioned along with Śaivas, Kāpālikas, Sāmkhyas and Buddhists in the Śravana Belgola epitaph of Mallisena of 1129 A. D. or thereabouts, engraved on a pillar of the temple of Pārśvanātha on the Candiagiri hill, which describes a Jaina teacher named Vimalacandra as having publicly challenged all of them to controversy (verse 26) ¹ Another Jaina reference to the Pāsupatas is in Hemacandra's Yogāsāstra 4. 102 wherein he describes a number of Pāsupata practices (vv. 26-22), ² which can be better understood by referring to the account of the system in the Ratna commentary on Ganakārikā. The Pāsupatas, it may be noted, indulged in ceremonial singing and dancing and made various kinds of what to them were auspicious sounds. Hemacandra, however, presents them in an unfavourable light, as liars and quacks and of loose morals. His remarks should be taken with a grain of salt as the relations between the Jainas and the Śaiva sects were not very cordial ³

It will be seen that we have an almost unbroken record of Pāsupata tenets from about the eighth to the twelfth century. The Pāsupata school seems to have undergone a sort of revival in the tenth century. The brief but authoritative text Ganakārikā was composed in this century, and not only Somadeva but Udayana, as stated below, refers to the system. A Mysore inscription, dated 943 A. D., states that Lakulīśa, the traditional founder of the Pāsupata system, became incarnate as a sage named Cilluka to preserve the continuity of his name and doctrines, which points to a revival of Pāsupata teachings in the Mysore country in the latter half of the tenth century; and the sect, in fact, wielded considerable influence in that region for nearly two centuries after this. An inscription found in the temple of Harsanātha in the Sikar principality of Jaipur State mentions a scholar named Viśvarūpa who was a teacher of the Pañcārtha-Lākulāmnāya, that is, the sacred book of Lakulīn, called Pañcārtha ⁴ The inscription is dated 957 A. D., and Viśvarūpa was thus a contemporary of Somadeva ⁵

RÉSUMÉ

Roughly speaking, Somadeva in his Yasastilaka considers certain doctrines of the Sāṃkhya, Buddhist, Vedānta, Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika, Lokāyata, Jaiminiya, Śaiva, Pāśupata and Kaula systems. Early in the tenth century Siddhaisi records the doctrines of the Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Sāṃkhya, Lokāyata, Buddhist and Mimāṃsā systems in his Upamiti-bhava-prapañcākathā (Chap 4), and describes in this connection the views of the four schools of Buddhist thought: Vaibhāsika, Sautrāntika, Yogācāra and Madhyamaka. Late in the century Udayana mentions several schools of thought at the beginning of his Nyāyakusumāñjali the Aupanisadas or the Vedāntins, the Kāpilas or Sāṃkhyas, the Pātañjalas, the Mahāpāsupatas,¹ the Śaivas, the Vaisnavas, the Paurāṇikas, the Yājñikas, the Digambara Jainas, the Mimāṃsakas, the Naiyāyikas and the Cārvakas. A comparison of this list with the systems described by Somadeva, who seems to have been an elder contemporary of Udayana, shows that the Jaina writer does not mention the opinions of the Paurāṇikas as such nor does he refer to Vaisnava doctrines or the Pāñcarātra system. As regards the Yājñikas, Somadeva mentions the Yāgañīas, 'Experts in sacrificial lore', along with the Buddhists and the Nāstikas in a verse occurring in Yasastilaka VIII 43.² That the opinions of the Yājñikas still prevailed in the tenth century is shown by Somadeva's attack on Vedic sacrifices in the dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother in Book IV. The Yājñikas are mentioned also by Vidyānanda in Tattvārthaśloka-vārtika 1. 20 (verse 38), but here they appear to be identified with the Mimāṃsakas.³

- 1 According to Varadarāja and Śaṅkara Misra, the Mahāpāsupatas were those Pāsupatas who practised Mahāvratā, which usually means the Kāpālīka cult. See G. N. Kaviraja in Sarasvatī Bhavana Studies, Vol. II, p. 176. A Pāsupata appears in the farce Mattavilāsaprahasana composed early in the seventh century, and in it occurs the expression Mahāpāsupata (p. 26) which seems to refer to the Kāpālīka figuring in the play. As has already been stated, the Pāsupatas aimed at the acquisition of supernatural powers, and so did the Kāpālīkas (see Chap. XIII). It is probable that there was some affinity between the Mahāpāsupatas and the Kāpālīkas. It is, however, doubtful if the Mahāvratī mentioned in Prabodhacandrodaya 2.3 refers to the Pāsupata system, as explained in the Prakāśa commentary which says महाव्रत पाशुपतव्रत तत्सबन्धिनी महाव्रती पाशुपतशास्त्रसहति. The verse in question refers to various exponents of the Mimāṃsā system, and it is noteworthy that the Candrīkā commentary takes the expression as referring to the work of a writer of the Bhāṭṭa school of Mimāṃsā, named Mahāvratā. The verse in the play says सूक्तं नापि महोदधेरधिगतं महाव्रती नेक्षिता. The Candrīkā says महाव्रतो नाम भट्टमतानुवर्ती महोदधिप्रतिस्पर्धी. See below for more about the verse.

In the same work (1. 32 under verse 15) the Yājñika is said to reject Jaina notions such as those concerning Samvara, Nirjarā and Mokṣa¹

Statements such as those of Somadeva and Udayana help us to understand the character of the schools of thought current in their age. It may be added that Udayana refers also to the Tautātitas or the adherents of the Bhāṭṭa school of Mīmāṃsā at the beginning of his commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya and to the Prābhākara in Nyāyakusumāñjali (Chap 3), mentioning in this connection a Gauda Mīmāṃsaka, who is identified with the Pañcikākāra in Varadarāja's commentary Kusumāñjalibodhanī. The Pañcikākāra is Śālikānātha, the wellknown author of Prakaranapañcikā, an important work of the Prābhākara school of Mīmāṃsā, and to judge from Udayana's sarcastic remarks about him, he might be the former's contemporary and, if so, lived in the tenth century². Udayana refers also to Bhāskara's interpretation of the Vedānta in Nyāyakusumāñjali (chap 2),³ showing that Bhāskara's Brahmasūtra Bhāṣya, now almost forgotten, was current in his time. Going back a few years earlier than the tenth century, we come across Jayanta's Nyāyamañjarī, which also reveals a world of thought full of variety and covering a comprehensive range of intellectual activity. Jayanta refers to contemporary sects like Śaivas, Pāśupatas, Kaulas, Pāñcārātras, and Samsāramocakas (chap 4), and throughout his work he records and criticises the views of diverse schools of thought such as Bhāṭṭas, Prābhākaras, Vedāntists, Buddhists, Sāṃkhyas and Cārvākas, and noteworthy doctrines like Jñānakarma-samuccayavāda, Śabda-brahmavāda etc.

Apart from the schools of thought enumerated by Somadeva and Udayana, the tenth century saw also a revival of Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika studies, as witnessed by the works of Bhāsarvajña,⁴ Vyomaśiva,⁵ Udayana and Śrīdhara, and we may include in the list even Jayanta who wrote towards the end of the preceding century¹ Bhāsarvajña wrote Nyāyasāra on which there are numerous commentaries. Vyomaśiva wrote the Vyomavati commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya Udayana, who tried to fuse together Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika tenets,² wrote Nyāyakusumāñjali, Ātmatattva-viveka, Nyāya-vārtika-tātpariya-parisuddhi (commentary on Vācaspati's Tātpariyatīkā), Kṛāṇāvalī (commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya), and Lakṣanāvalī (984 A D), a manual of Vaiśeṣika definitions³ Śrīdhara wrote Nyāyakandalī (991 A D), a commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya It should also be noted that the expansion of Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika studies not only led to an intensive study of these systems but to the interpretation, criticism and refutation of the doctrines of the other schools, especially those of the Mīmāṃsā, Buddhist and Sāṃkhya systems It is not rare to find in the writings of the period diverse doctrines of other schools fully and clearly stated before they are subjected to criticism or any attempt is made to refute them This is particularly true of Jayanta's Nyāyamañjarī, and we have already referred in this connection to Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali. For other examples we need refer only to the accounts of the Buddhist theory of Ideas (with illustrative quotations), the Mīmāṃsā theory of the self-validity of cognitions (with citations from Kumāṇila), and the Sāṃkhya theory of cognition in Vyomavati (pp 524 ff, 579 ff, 521 ff.), the summary of Sāṃkhya doctrines in Nyāyakusumāñjali (chap. 1), and the discussion of the Prābhākara theory of error, and the clear presentation of Sphoṭavāda and other tenets in Śrīdhara's Nyāyakandalī (Pp 180 ff., 268 ff.). The latter work quotes, besides, various authors and works, e g Tantravārtika and Ślokavārtika (P. 257),⁴ Mandana's Sphoṭasiddhi (P. 270) and Vidhiviveka (P. 274), the Buddhist logician Dharmottara (P 76) etc The interrelation of the various schools is outside the scope of our discussion, but it is evident that there was considerable activity in the sphere of speculative thought, and the doctrines put forward by the different systems formed the basis of the intellectual movement of the century. It is perhaps the mutual conflict of so many schools of thought that led certain thinkers of the age to suggest the way to a synthesis, or proclaim the common ultimate goal of all systems and schools In a remarkable passage of Ātmatattvaviveka, Udayana "attempts to show that in its gradual ascent along the path of Moksa the soul is confronted with views which broaden out more and more. The different schools of philosophy representing the varied views thus obtained in passing are conceived to form a graduated series, arranged according to an ascending scale of spiritual realisation, and in such a scheme the lower is always supposed to be a stepping stone to the higher and is to be superseded by it"¹ Even more explicitly and with greater catholicity does the Jaina writer Siddharsi declare the essential unity underlying all faiths and systems of philosophy in his Upamati bhava-prapañcā kathā Book VIII (Pp. 1220-1227). The sum and substance of what he says is that the Supreme Soul is one. He is endowed with pure intelligence, and delivers the world with His infinite power. The true religion (Dharma) is also one and consists of such qualities as forbearance, kindness, purity, self-control, truth, chastity, honesty, sacrifice etc. Further, the Ultimate Truth, which is the way to final deliverance, is in reality one, although it may be expressed in different ways, and it is for the realisation of this Truth concerning the Supreme Lord that people undertake austerities, meditation and vows. Moksa is the subsistence of the soul in its pristine condition characterized by infinite intelligence, conation, joy and power, and known by such names as Supreme Attainment, Bliss, Peace, the endless Good, the Deathless State, Brahman, Nirvāna etc. The Doctrine that reveals the One God, the One Dharma and the One Truth, and propounds such a state of final deliverance is alone authoritative and commands universal jurisdiction. It is the purport of this Doctrine that men learn with special care and enunciate in varieties of expression. Call it Vaisnava, Brāhmanical, Śaiva, Buddhist or Jaina, it is all the same the difference in name does not count so long as the meaning remains the same. Such assertions as 'I am right and you are wrong', 'my system is right and yours is wrong' are only a manifestation of jealousy and nothing more. Siddharsi's sublime conception of the spiritual unity of man is no doubt much in advance of his age.

3 Udayana wrote also a commentary on Gotama's Sūtras (न्यायपरिशिष्ट) and प्रबोधसिद्धि, an original treatise on Nyāya See G. N. Kaviraja in Sarasvatī Bhāṣana Studies, Vol III, p 112 ff

Somadeva's review of the tenets of the different schools of thought is important as illustrating the Jaina standpoint, and much of what he says is no doubt cogent and valuable even as an independent effort in philosophical criticism. As a matter of fact, he belongs in this respect to a line of Jaina scholars who have discussed, criticised and attempted to refute the doctrines of other schools of thought both before and after the tenth century, for example, Haribhadra, Akalanka, Vidyānanda, Anantavīrya, Prabhācandra, Hemacandra, Vādhveya, Mallisena and others. It should, however, be pointed out that, so far as the Brahmanical schools are concerned, the reaction to the impact of

1 G. N. Kaviraja in Sarasvatī Bhavana Studies, Vol III, p 112

Jaina thought and criticism is surprisingly small, and except for isolated comments and criticism, the vast literature of the Brahmanical systems hardly takes any adequate notice of Jaina tenets and objections. Among noteworthy criticisms of Jaina doctrines may be mentioned those of Śamkara in his Bhāṣya on Veśānta Sūtras 2 2 33-36 and of Kumāṇila in S'lokavārtika (Codanāsūtra, v 141 ff, S'abdarantyaādādhikarana, v 106 ff etc), but, generally speaking, it may be said that Brahmanical writers from Śamkara to Udayana have directed their polemical energies against Buddhist rather than Jaina doctrines. To confine ourselves to the Jaina conception of Mokṣa, which it is the intention of Somadeva to contrast with the non-Jaina theories on the subject, it is recorded and criticized as follows by Vyomaśiva in the introductory portion of his commentary on the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya

Jayanta who devotes so much space to the doctrines of other systems, makes only a passing reference to the Jaina conception of the Self, and summarily rejects certain Jaina tenets as absurd in his Nyāyamañjarī (Chap 9),¹ and it is noteworthy that although he discusses in that chapter the theories of salvation of diverse schools of thought, he has only a fling at certain practices of the Digambara Jaina monks and the absurdity of the notion that such practices lead to salvation. He declares that these monks expect to attain final release by plucking out their hair and going about naked if they were right, bald persons would attain mokṣa straightway, and so would the animals, because they, too, are unclad! Such criticism, of course, does not rise above the level of comic satire of the type found in plays like Mattavilāsaprahasana and Prabodhacandrodaya

CHAPTER X

JAINA DOGMATICS AND MORAL AND SPIRITUAL DISCIPLINE

Apart from the fact that one of the aims of Yasastilaka is to illustrate the doctrine of ahimsā, the work is designed to be a comprehensive manual of Jaina doctrines, and the object of Somadeva is to provide entertainment as well as religious instruction, and help forward the propagation of the Jaina faith. Books VI, VII and VIII of Yasastilaka, divided into forty-six lalpas or sections, are styled Upāsakādhyayana or Readings for laymen, and deal elaborately with samyaktva or right faith and its various aspects as well as the different vows, which are viewed as the mainstay (upabrmhaka) of right faith. Somadeva's treatment of these topics is wider than that of many professed manuals on the subject, and what is more remarkable, illustrated in some cases by elaborate stories, which, although not original, are narrated in a manner peculiarly his own. In addition to the contents of Books VI-VIII, there are brief expositions of Jaina doctrines in Books IV and V, while the Anupreksās are treated in an elaborate body of verse in Book II. It is true that the Jaina canon and its doctrines had been fixed long before the tenth century, but the age of Somadeva was an era of systematization and interpretation, and judged from this standpoint, his comprehensive review of the salient topics of Jaina dogmatics has a definite place in the literature of Jainism in Sanskrit.

I) Only a brief outline of Somadeva's exposition of Jaina dogma can be attempted in this chapter, and we may start with an interesting summary of the teachings of Jainism contained in a group of verses occurring in the dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother in Book IV. The summary is in the form of question and answer, and purports to report a conversation between Yaśodhara and a Digambara saint on the tenets of the Jaina religion. It is somewhat as follows: "What is Dharma? That which inculcates kindness to all creatures. Who is Āpta? He who is free from worldly blemishes. What is the means to know him? A sāstra free from contradictory statements. What constitutes religious austerities? Extermination of all desire for worldly objects. What is jīva? That which possesses self-experienced attributes such as the intellectual faculty. How does the incorporeal jīva come into contact with the body? It is bound to the body by its own actions, just as the sky comes into contact with the dust raised by wind, and by its own actions it is subjected to birth in order that it may suffer their consequences, just as a learned Brahmin is made to tumble over an unclean substance by intoxicating drugs. How can Dharma be acquired? By observing the vows to the best of one's ability. What is a vow? The extermination of desire preceded by the acquisition of faith. What is faith? Reasoned belief in the categories (recognised by Jainism). What are the categories? They are the agencies which uphold the universe"¹

The great discourse on Samyaktva or Right faith in Book VI opens with a further definition of Dharma, which is described as the factor causing human advancement resulting in supreme beatitude. It consists of pravṛtti and nivṛtti, and applies to householders as well as monks. Pravṛtti is endeavour to attain salvation, while Nivṛtti is abstention from all that leads to worldly bondage². Faith, knowledge and conduct are the causes of salvation, while worldly bondage is caused by false doctrine, non-abstention (from injury, theft etc.), passions (anger, pride, greed and deceit), and yoga or the activity of body, mind and speech. Samyaktva or faith is concentration on things that conform to reason; knowledge is that which is free from ignorance, doubt and error, and right conduct is complete cessation of all activity that leads to the acquisition of *Karma*³. We are also told at the end of Book VI that Samyaktva is faith in the fundamental principles, knowledge is determining the nature of the fundamental principles; and conduct is complete detachment, devoid of all action whatsoever⁴. Right faith, right knowledge and right conduct are the most important factors in the Jain view of liberation. As Kundakunda says in Samayasāra (verse 162), Samyaktva is faith in the soul and the other categories, the comprehension of their nature is (right) knowledge, and the renunciation of desire, passions etc. is (right) conduct, the three constituting the path to salvation⁵. It may be noted that Somadeva does not discourse on knowledge and conduct, but expounds Samyaktva in detail.

II) The whole of Book VI, after a preliminary discourse on the doctrines of other schools of thought, is devoted to the interpretation of Samyaktva, 'the great tutelary deity of man' (narānām mahatī puruṣa-deratā) Samyaktva or Right Faith depends upon a certain attitude of mind produced by the realisation of the nature of the categories, just as gold is said to be produced by the mere contact of fire with specially treated mercury. It is not necessary to master the scriptures or subject the body to austerities or journey elsewhere or wait for the lapse of time for acquiring Samyaktva. It is the prime cause of salvation, just as the foundation is the mainstay of a palace, good luck that of beauty, life that of bodily enjoyment, royal power that of victory, culture that of nobility, and policy that of government.¹

Samyaktva is primarily faith in Āpta, Āgama and the Padāṁthas or Categories. It may be produced in two ways, has eight components, and is characterised by prasama and other qualities, and free from erroneous beliefs (mudhatva). Before considering the various aspects of Samyaktva, Somadeva explains in detail the nature of Āpta, Āgama and the Padāṁthas (VI 2, 3.)

III) The Āpta, as the Jaina Tīthamkaras are generically called, is defined as omniscient and free from all blemishes, he is the lord of the universe and the benefactor of all creatures.² He extricates the world from the ocean of suffering by teaching the fundamental truths, and is therefore to be regarded as the lord of the universe, whom the three worlds obey.³ He is pure and free from the eighteen defects common to all living creatures such as hunger, thirst, fear, passion, birth, old age, disease, death, anger, sorrow, sleep etc., and is endowed with infinite knowledge, and is the only source of words of wisdom.⁴ Passion, hatred and ignorance are the cause of telling a lie, but as the Āpta is free from these, he has no occasion for uttering a falsehood.⁵ He resembles in shape the heterogeneous creatures (i.e. men), is a mirror unto the universe, and the master of the worlds.⁶

For various reasons such as subjection to passion, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva, the Sun-god, or the Buddha cannot claim to be the Āpta. Brahmā is attached to the nymph Tilottamā, and Viṣṇu devoted to Laksmī, while Śiva has Pārvati forming half his body, and yet they are called Āptas! Vasudeva was the father of Kṛṣṇa, and Devakī was his mother, and he himself fulfilled the duties of a king, yet, strangely enough, he is called a god! Further, if the universe exists in his stomach, and he himself is omnipresent, how can he be subject to birth and death?¹ As regards Śiva, being subject to worldly blemishes like passion in his corporeal form, he lacks the authority to propound a religious code, while, in his incorporeal form, Sadāśiva, he lacks the capacity to do so. Besides, with his five mouths, he teaches mutually contradictory doctrines, of which it would be impossible to ascertain the meaning. It is said that a portion of Sadāśiva becomes incarnate in Rudra in every age, but in that case there would be no difference between the two forms of the deity (the one incorporeal and the other endowed with physical form), just as there cannot be any difference between gold and a fragment of it. It is also strange that the deity should indulge in such freaks as begging, dancing, nudity, the destruction of the Three Cities, the killing of Brahmā and the carrying of a human skull in his hands.² The Śaiva system, its principles and the nature of its Omniscient deity constitute, therefore, a strange medley of contradictions in respect of the basic doctrine, methods of proof, poetical representation and actual practice.³

With regard to Sun-worship, it is strange that the sun alone should be worshipped and not the moon, although the latter also is a planet the cult surely represents the thoughtless activity of people who have never examined the Truth.⁴ As for the Buddhist, he favours indulgence and continence as well as unrestrained indulgence, and is addicted to wine and flesh. how can he be respected by the wise?⁵ It seems to be the object of Somadeva to show that lack of passion or renunciation is an essential condition of Āpta-hood, and no faith which does not inculcate absolute renunciation can be said to have an Āpta or trustworthy spiritual overlord. It may also be noted that the question of Āpta was an important controversial issue between the Śaivas and the Jainas, and their respective arguments, which Somadeva here analyses, have been summarized in Chap. VIII.

IV) Āgama or a religious code can be pure only if the Āpta is pure, just as children are pure when their parents are of pure descent¹ An Āgama, which does not conform to reason owing to contradictory statements, is like the raving of a mad man, and can have no authority² The true Āgama is so called because it makes us comprehend (gamayan) things relating to the present, past and future by occupying itself with the problems of religious virtue, material prosperity, desires and liberation, and pointing out what is to be shunned and what accepted³

The Jaina Āgama deals with five categories the self, the non-self, the constitution of the universe, and bondage and liberation with their causes⁴ The Self is the knower and the seer, great and subtle, and acts and suffers. It is coextensive with the body, and ascendant by nature.⁵ It is endowed with knowledge and discernment, without which it would be in no way different from a lifeless object. On the other hand, if it be regarded as pure knowledge, it would not have any definite idea, like the painted figure of a man that is neither friend nor foe⁶ Karma is directed by the Self and the Self is directed by Karma, they are like the boat and the boatman and have no one else⁷ to direct them⁸ The Self is, by nature, endowed with unlimited power, although it is confined within the body, like a mystic formula circumscribed by the letters of which it is composed.⁹

Ajiva or the non-self comprises Dharma, Adharma, Space, Time and Pudgala or Matter. Dharma is the underlying principle of motion, Adharma that of rest, Space that of non-resistance, and Time that of change; while Pudgala or Matter is endowed with form, touch, taste, smell and colour.¹

Bandha or bondage is due to the mutual infiltration of Karma and the Self, and their relation is like that of gold and rust. Bondage has no beginning, but has an end.² There are four different aspects of bondage according to prakṛti or the nature of karma, of which there are eight varieties,³ sthiti or the duration of each kind of karma in contact with the soul, anubhāga or the consequences of karma, and pradeśa or the number of karmic molecules that enter the soul.⁴ It may be noted that Somadeva merely enumerates the different aspects of Bandha which is treated in detail in the Tattvārthādhigamasūtra, chap. VIII.

Moksa or liberation is the coming of the Self into its own after shedding all inner impurities. Liberation is not non-existence nor lack of consciousness.⁵ Somadeva gives two other definitions of the Jain view of liberation. In VI 1 he defines moksa as a state characterised by supreme joy, knowledge, power, potency and subtleness in the highest degree.⁶ In VIII. 39 moksa is defined as the state in which the Self acquires its own characteristics.⁷

The Three jewels (Right faith, Right knowledge and Right conduct) are the causes of salvation, while bondage is caused by false views, lack of self-restraint and other factors such as passions and yoga or the vibrations produced in the soul by the activities of mind, body and speech.⁸ Lack of faith in Āpta, Āgama and the Padārthas, error and doubt constitute Mithyātva or false views.⁹ Taking only one aspect of a matter into consideration, doubt, lack of discrimination, erroneous notions, equal respect for all deities and faiths. these five also constitute Mithyātva, as they contribute towards worldly bondage.¹⁰ It may be noted that Somadeva seems here to follow Pūjyapāda's commentary on Tattvārthasūtra VIII. 1. Absence of vows, carelessness, cruelty, lack of contentment, and subservience to the dictates of the senses are collectively called Asamyama or lack of self-restraint¹ The four passions, anger, pride, deceit and greed, with their four varieties, plunge the creatures into the sea of transmigration; and activities connected with the mind, speech and the body, according as they are good and bad, are the factors which attach virtues and vices to the Self.²

The next Padārtha is the universe, which is, in the Jain view, without foundation or support, uncreated and free from destruction. It is situated in the midst of space, and rests on air (that is, on the three atmospheres of dense liquid, gross air and thin air)³ Somadeva records the criticism of this theory by other schools of thought. The Jainas, they say, do not regard the universe with the earth, mountains and oceans as being fixed anywhere nor do they believe that it is upheld by a fish or a tortoise or a serpent or a boar (as in Brahmanical mythology) so they fancy air as upholding the unsupported universe, an absolutely foolhardy proposition. How can air that cannot uphold even clods of earth, wood and similar substances uphold the universe?⁴ Somadeva tries to refute this objection by pointing out that the clouds which inundate the universe with rainwater are kept aloft in the sky solely by the force of air.⁴

V) Somadeva goes on to say that those who hold false opinions, not being able to find fault with the conception of Āpta, Āgama and the Padārthas, censure Jain (Digambara) ascetics for abstaining from bath and ablutions and going about naked and eating their food standing⁵ He tries to defend each of these practices, and says with regard to bathing that it is useless for ascetics, who observe chastity, and are bent on a spiritual way of life. Besides, they do take a bath to avoid pollution caused by contact with Kāpālikas, women in their periods, Cāndālas and *Śābaras*⁶ Similarly, wholesale ablutions are superfluous on the ground that it is necessary to wash only the limb which gets actually soiled, no one, for instance, cuts off the nose when a finger is bitten by a serpent.¹

As regards nakedness, it is urged that the wise hate what is artificial, but not the observance of what is natural. Nakedness is natural where is the ground to hate it?² Further, it would be impossible for the ascetics to observe the vows of non-possession and non-injury if they desired to wear robes made of barks or deer-skins.³ As for the custom of taking food standing, Somadeva says that its observance does not lead to heaven nor does the failure to observe it lead to hell. The custom merely marks a certain resolution of an ascetic 'I will take food only so long as it comes to the hollow of my palm and I am able to take it standing; otherwise I will abstain from food altogether.'⁴

VI) After dealing with the essential Jaina doctrines and the custom of the Digambara munis, Somadeva enumerates a large number of religious practices, repugnant to Jainism, and collectively called Mūḍha or Stupid customs and beliefs, from which Samyaktva or Right faith must be absolutely free. They are sun-worship; bath during eclipses, giving away money on samkrānti days; the morning and evening ablutions; fire-worship, the worship of edifices; ceremonial bathing in rivers and the ocean, adoration of trees, stūpas, and sacred offerings of boiled rice, religious suicide by falling from a precipice, bowing at the tail of a cow and taking cow's urine; and the worship of jewels, conveyances, weapons, the earth, Yaksas and mountains.⁵ Association with heretics of other faiths and the adherents of the Vedas also comes within the scope of Mūḍha of which there are many varieties.⁶ To attribute divinity to what is not divine, to adopt as a vow what is not really a vow,

'Alien cultus' or heathenism is one of the three deadly sins in Judaism, the others being unchastity in all its forms and homicide. Moore Judaism, vol I, p 466, vol II, p 267. Jainism, on the other hand, appears to treat heathenism as an error of judgment, and keeps it distinct from the cardinal sins envisaged by the Anuvratas.

and to accept as the truth what is not a truth at all constitute Mithyātva or falsehood, which has to be renounced¹ Somadeva defines in this connection the attitude of Jainism towards novices. If a convert to Jainism cannot altogether renounce all his false beliefs, he ought to be given a mixed reception, but it is not advisable to discard him altogether.² On the other hand, persons who are wicked by nature should not be induced to accept the Jain doctrine, but proper consideration should be shown to those who voluntarily adopt the faith³ (VI. 4).

VII) Somadeva next deals with the angas or auxiliaries of Samyaktva, but it will be convenient to summarize first the different aspects of the doctrine enumerated in the concluding section of Book VI.

First, Samyaktva or Right faith may be realised naturally i.e. by intuition with but little effort or acquired from external sources with great effort⁴ Samyaktva is said to be naturally produced⁵ when faith in the fundamental principles of Jainism comes into being 'without the suffering attendant on mental wanderings in the wilderness of deliberation', as a result, for instance, of remembering previous births, or hearing religious discourses, or meditating on the image of a Jain Tirthamkara, or witnessing great religious festivals, or any other similar cause. Samyaktva is said to be acquired⁶ when faith in the tattvas comes into being after a long time, as a result of great efforts made in thoroughly investigating all the scriptural texts,⁷ which can only be understood with the help of methodical instruction by a wise teacher

Secondly, Samyaktva may be of two, three and ten kinds according to the standpoint from which it is viewed, but faith in the fundamental principles is the common feature of all its phases.⁸

a) Samyaktva may be of two kinds, sarāga or accompanied by desire and vitārāga or free from desire. It is sarāga up to the eleventh gunasthāna or stage of spiritual development, it is vitārāga in the last three stages. Sarāga Samyaktva has certain fundamental characteristics such as prasama etc., while Vitārāga Samyaktva is characterised by the absolute purity of the soul.⁹

Somadeva observes that just as the virility of a man, which cannot be perceived with the senses, can be ascertained from his relations with women, or the generation of children, or his fortitude in danger, or the execution of his designs; similarly, the existence of the Jewel of Right Faith, although extremely subtle owing to its being a condition of the soul, may be inferred from the qualities of Prasāma, Samvega, Anukampā and Āstikya.¹

Prasāma is restraining the mind from passions and other evil tendencies.² Samvega is fear caused by worldly existence, the source of all kinds of sufferings, and fleeting like a dream or a magic show.³ As Hemacandra observes in his Yogaśāstra 2 15, Samvega is man's longing for liberation. Anukampā is kindness to all creatures; it is the fundamental basis of dharma.⁴ Āstikya is a believing attitude of the mind towards the Āpta, the scriptures, the vows and the fundamental principles.⁵ Somadeva concludes by saying that long is the worldly bondage of the man who is subject to the fury of the passions, devoid of vows, cruel and unbelieving.⁶ It may be added that some writers mention another characteristic of Samyaktva, mrveda or indifference to the world.⁷

b) Samyaktva may be of three kinds according as it is accompanied by the destruction of the karmas or their abatement or the process of partial abatement and destruction.⁸ Somadeva does not treat the topic in detail, but it may be noted that Samyaktva, viewed from this standpoint, is classified into ksāyika, aupasāmika and ksayopasāmika, the characteristics of which are explained in detail in Pūjyapāda's commentary on Tattvārthasūtra II. 3-5. Briefly speaking, Ksāyika Samyaktva is caused by the destruction of seven particular kinds of karma, Aupasāmika Samyaktva is caused by the mitigation of the four passions and the three kinds of darśanamoha, and Ksāyopasāmika Samyaktva is caused by the mitigation of the existing four passions and mithyātva and samyaktvamithyātva and the destruction of their germs.

c) Samyaktva may also be of ten kinds according to the sources from which it is derived. These sources are ājñā, the command of the scriptures composed by the exalted and omniscient Arihat or Tīthamkara, mārga, the investigation of the Three Jewels of Right Faith, Right knowledge and Right conduct, upadesa, listening to the life-stories of the great men of old such as the Tīthamkaras, the Cakravartins etc., sūtra, the code regulating the conduct and behaviour of the ascetics, bija, a clue to the understanding of all sections of the doctrine, samksepa, summary knowledge of the main topics of the system, Āpta, sūtra or the sacred canon, the vows and the categories, vistara, comprehensive knowledge of the vast canonical literature consisting of the twelve Angas, the fourteen Pūrvas and the Prakīrnas, artha, personal conviction in matters connected with the sacred lore, avagādha, profound knowledge of some part of the threefold Canon, and paramāvagādha, the conviction of a man possessing the three kinds of supernatural knowledge, viz., avadhi, manahpariyaya and *kevala*¹ Samyaktva is thus tenfold according to the source from which it is derived, and we have therefore ten types of Samyaktva. mārgasamyaktva, sūtrasamyaktva, arthasamyaktva and so on.

In early literature the above ten aspects of Samyaktva are dealt with in Uttarādhyayanāsūtra XXVIII 16 ff, although some of the sources are differently given 'Faith is produced by 1. nisaiga, nature; 2 upadesa, instruction, 3 ājñā, command, 4 sūtra, study of the sūtras, 5. bija, suggestion, 6 abhigama, comprehension of the meaning of the sacred lore, 7. vistara, complete course of study, 8. kriyā, religious exercise, 9. samksepa, brief exposition, 10 dharma, the Law'² The Sūtra defines each of these factors in detail, and later writers explain them in their own way. The following verse, quoted by Somadeva in Yasastilaka VI 21, being enumeration of the ten kinds of Samyaktva, occurs in Gunabhadra's Ātmānusāsana VIII) Somadeva enumerates twentyfive hindrances to Samyaktva, known as drgdosāh the three kinds of mūdha or mūdhatā, the eight madās, the six *anāyatana*s, and the eight defects, samkā etc.¹ He does not explain any of these except the group of eight defects. The three kinds of mūdha are lokamūdha consisting of stupid popular customs such as dips in sacred water, devamūdha or the worship of false deities, ghosts, spirits and the like; and samayamūdha or following the lead of those who profess false doctrines such as astrology, magic lore etc. The eight kinds of mada or pride are pride of birth, family, beauty, wealth, intellect, knowledge of the scripture, honour and power respectively, as explained in the Bhāṣya on Tattvārtha-sūtra IX. 6. What is not āyatana or abode (of right faith) is anāyatana. The six *anāyatana*s are a false deity subject to passion and hate; the followers of such a deity, false austerities, those who practise such austerities; false scriptures, and the followers of such scriptures.² The group of eight defects consists of samkā, kāmkṣā, vicikitsā, mūdhadrsti, lack of upagūhana, lack of sthitikāra, lack of vātsalya and lack of prabhāvana. These will be explained later.

Gunabhadra clearly explains the ten kinds of Samyaktva in the following verses (ibid. 12-14):

After enumerating the twentyfive hindrances to Samyaktva, Somadeva points out that a man of right conduct, who possesses right faith, and is conversant with the fundamental truths, attains salvation, even though he is devoid of vows, while a man without faith can never attain salvation, even though he observes the vows.³ External functions and external karma are mere agencies when the three Jewels (Right Faith, Right Knowledge and Right Conduct) are mature, the soul becomes impregnated with them.⁴ Right knowledge is not derived from the senses nor right faith from delusion nor right conduct from the body when the soul attains the supreme bliss of liberation, it simply becomes one with those three.⁵ It will be seen that right faith, right knowledge and right conduct are regarded as conditions of the soul, which is, in the ultimate resort, identified with them. Nemicaṇḍra puts the idea clearly in his Dravyasamgraha (verse 39) when he says that, from the ordinary point of view, right faith, knowledge and conduct are the causes of salvation, but in reality one's own soul is the cause of liberation, consisting as it does of those three.⁶ Among early writers Kundakunda says in

Samayasāra (verse 19) that a saint should always resort to (right) belief, knowledge and conduct, these three are in reality nothing but the soul itself¹ The same author says in Niyamasāra (verse 96) that the soul is to be meditated upon as consisting of pure knowledge, pure faith, joy and pure consciousness²

As has already been said, Somadeva deals only with Samyaktva or Samyagdarśana, Right faith, and regards it as the corner-stone of the entire system of Jaina religion and ethics. After dealing with the various aspects of Samyaktva, he sums them up in the following verse occurring in Yasastilaka VIII 35.

तत्त्वेषु प्रणय परोऽस्य मनसः श्रद्धानमुक्तं जिनैरेतद्विजिदशप्रभेदविषयं व्यक्तं चतुर्भिर्गुणैः ।
अष्टाङ्गं भुवनत्रयाचिंतमिदं मूढैरपोढं त्रिभिश्चित्ते देवं दधामि संसृतिरतो ह्यासावसानोत्सवम् ॥

The different kinds of Samyaktva, two, three and ten, as the case may be, and its four characteristics, referred to in the verse, have already been explained. Samyaktva should also be free from the three types of mūḍha, that is loka-mūḍha, deva-mūḍha, and samaya-mūḍha (see above). Besides, it has eight angas which are elaborately explained and illustrated by Somadeva in Yasastilaka VI 5-20.

IX) The eight angas or auxiliaries of Samyaktva are freedom from śamkā, freedom from kāṁksā or ākāṁksā, freedom from vicikitsā or vinindā, freedom from anyasāghā or mūḍhatā, upagūha, sthitikāra, prabhāvana and vātsalya. Conversely, śamkā, kāṁksā, vicikitsā, mūḍhatā and lack of upagūha, lack of sthitikāra, lack of prabhāvana and lack of vātsalya form a group of defects which hamper the growth of Samyaktva, and are included among the twentyfive dr̥gdosāḥ. Somadeva's account of the angas of Samyaktva are summarised below.

Śamkā, ākāṁksā, vinindā and anyasāghā are the four obstacles to the growth of Samyaktva or Right Faith. Śamkā is fear or hesitation, which causes lack of resolution and the consequent inability to follow in a steadfast manner the chosen doctrine or vow. The story of the fickle sage Jamadagni is meant to illustrate this failing, while Jinadatta and Padmaratha represent the type of devotees who do not flinch from their vows even in the face of death.³ Freedom from śamkā enabled even a criminal like Lalita to attain success in the difficult mystic rites, which the pious Dharasena had commenced but failed to accomplish owing to his fear and indecision.

2 केवलणसहावो केवलदसणसहावसुहमइओ । केवलसत्तिसहावो सोइ इदि चित्तए णाणी ॥

3 See Chap. XVI for the stories.

S'amlā is, properly speaking, the fear of a man that he is alone and has no protector in the three worlds, it is the fear born of the ills of world and death.¹ Śamkā is also lack of decision, that is, inability to choose between one doctrine and another, one vow and another, and one divinity and another.²

Ākāṃksā is the desire for worldly happiness, which hampers constancy of faith and the practice of vows. To preserve the purity of one's faith one must renounce the desires and aspirations born of this and the other world, and those encouraged by other faiths based on erroneous doctrines.³ One must not, for instance, aspire to become a god or a Yakṣa or a king as a result of one's devotion to Right Faith.⁴ To exchange Samyaktva or Right Faith for the joys of the world is like exchanging a ruby for butter-milk, and nothing but self-deception.⁵ Equanimity of mind (anākulā cittavṛttiḥ) in matters of religion is the sure basis of all prosperity and bliss. To develop right faith one must, therefore, be free from attachment to the world; and the chaste maiden Anantamati is praised for rejecting her chance of worldly happiness for the sake of her vow.

Vinindā or Vicikitsā is doubt or hesitation in the exercise of piety as inculcated by one's faith. One must, for instance, have no hesitation in succouring the poor and the sick, however loathsome the object of one's pity may be, because one is required to do so by one's religion. King Auddāyana was praised by Indra, because he personally tended helpless, old and diseased ascetics without scruple or hesitation.⁶ It is one's own fault if one is unable to follow the course of conduct prescribed by one's religion or grasp its meaning. It is the fault of the eye if the clear and luminous sky appears to be dark.⁷ He who neglects the teachings of one's religion at the sight of physical defects is like a man who rejects gold at the sight of rust on iron.⁸ The good who view the teachings of the scriptures and the nature of the body in their proper perspective feel no scruples of any kind in carrying out tenets of their faith.⁹

Anyasīlāghā or Mūdhata is attachment to the dogmas of other faiths, which a devout Jaina must avoid. The Vedic, Buddhist, and Śaiva scriptures are dismissed by the author as favouring the use of honey, meat and wine, as also the Vedic religion which prescribes sacrifices as a means to salvation. Such practices as purification with earth etc., ceremonial bathing, sprinkling of water, ablutions, and the worship of the Manes and the Fire, the use of deceitful speech, holy ashes, cowdung plasters and Kuśa seats, the wearing of matted hair, ceremonial cloth and girdle; the carrying of clubs and bamboo baskets, and mystic poses of the fingers—all these are described as the stock-in-trade of those who are ignorant of the inner truth.¹ The erroneous dogmas of other systems are attractive in outward appearance but dangerous in their inner significance, they are like the lumpāka fruit, and should never be relied upon.² A follower of the Jaina faith should neither praise nor become acquainted with such doctrines nor be misled by the knowledge and science of other schools of thought.³ The devout lady Revatī is accordingly praised for the utter indifference to divinities not recognised by the Jaina scriptures.

Somadeva then describes the four attributes which contribute to the growth of Samyaktva. They are upagūha, sthitikāra, prabhāvana and vātsalya. Upagūha or Dharmopabrmhana is guarding the reputation of one's religion by suppressing or concealing such faults of one's co-religionists as may lower it in the estimation of others. It is, of course, one's duty to enhance the prestige of one's faith by the cultivation of such virtues as forbearance, truthfulness, purity, mercy and honesty, and by the practice of austerities, self-control and charity.⁴ At the same time, if any of one's co-religionists commits an offence by chance or error, 'one should conceal it with the wealth of one's own virtues' as does a mother that of her children.⁵ This seems to mean that one should establish the innocence of the culprit, even if the attempt should entail personal loss or damage. When, for instance, the bogus Jaina ascetic was arrested by the police for stealing the merchant's Jewel, the latter, being a good Jaina, declared that he had himself given it to the thief, because the conviction of a Jaina ascetic for theft would have lowered the prestige of Jainism among the populace.

who were not acquainted with the real facts¹ Somadeva goes on to say that a religion cannot be sullied by the misdemeanour of a weakling among its adherents, just as the ocean does not become foul on account of a frog dying in its waters.² This is, of course, true of all religions, but the Jainas seem to be prepared, under certain circumstances, to ignore occasional infractions of the moral code if they can thereby save their religion from any possible opprobrium or disgrace.

Sthīrikāra is the strengthening of the conviction of those among one's co-religionists who may be faltering in their loyalty to the faith, and show signs of breaking away from the fold. A person initiated into the Jain religion may be wavering in his allegiance owing to the rigour of the vows and insufficient knowledge of the scriptures, and it is the duty of the faithful to hearten him and strengthen his loyalty to the faith.³ A novice must not be discarded on account of a single lapse, and the aim of a good Jaina should be 'the advancement of the community', to be accomplished by constant efforts to win back waverers and sceptics and restore their allegiance.⁴ The ends of religion can be served only by the efforts of various types of men, and each one should be assigned the rôle for which he is fit.⁵ Any negligence of this principle deprives men of access to the truth, prolongs the cycle of births, and contributes to the decay of the faith.⁶ The story of Vāṁsena illustrates this aspect of one's obligations to one's religion.

Prabhāvana is propagation of the faith by the installation of images and the establishment of temples and the institution of worship and festivals as well as by the diffusion of knowledge and the practice of manifold austerities.⁷ We are also told that it is one's duty to enhance the prestige of the faith, without any motives of worldly gain, by means of charity and diverse forms of knowledge and science and the celebration of grand festivals and ceremonies.⁸ The story of Vajrakumāra shows that a good Jaina must be prepared to defend his religion against the encroachments of rival sects.

Vātsalya is helping one's co-religionists in distress, as illustrated in the story of the sage Viṣṇu. Connected with vātsalya are certain kindred virtues which a Jaina layman ought to cultivate. They are vinaya, vaiyāvṛtya, and bhakti. Vinaya is respect for one's teacher, fellow-student, and the community, and for the study of the scriptures and ideal of self-control¹. Vaiyāvṛtya is efficient service rendered to the miserable and the sick². Bhakti is pure and sincere devotion to Jina, the Jaina scriptures, and Jaina religious teachers distinguished for their austerities and learning.³

X) Somadeva next deals with the salient features of Jaina religious and moral discipline in detail. In Book VII he defines Viata as the mainstay of Samyaktva, and it is of two kinds according as it is based on the Mūlagunas and Uttaragunas. The Mūlagunas are eight, consisting as they do of abstention from wine, meat, honey and five kinds of fruits such as Udumbara, Aśvattha, Plaksa and Nyagrodha, which are the breeding ground of various living organisms, visible and invisible⁴. A number of stories is told to illustrate some of the mūlagunas, and it is asserted that flesh-eaters have no kindness, drunkards never speak the truth, and people who take honey and the Udumbara fruit feel no pity.⁵

Drinking is condemned by saying that it is the root of all evils, since it completely deludes the mind, and is therefore the greatest of all sins. Owing to the loss of the power of discrimination men commit all kinds of sins, which lead to their wandering in the wilderness of worldly existence.⁶ It is well-known that wine was the cause of the ruin of the Yādavas, just as gambling was the cause of that of the *Pāndavas*⁷. Somadeva records also a curious belief that some persons, after a long succession of births and rebirths, are in the course of time transformed into wine to delude the minds of men. The number of sentient beings transformed into a single drop of wine is large enough to fill the universe⁸.

With regard to the prohibition of meat-eating, Somadeva wonders how people who seek their own welfare hope to increase their own flesh with the flesh of others¹ Just as one's own life is dear to one, similarly the life of another is dear to him, and one should therefore refrain from destroying animal life² The objection to honey is based on the ground that it is pressed out of 'the young eggs in the womb of bees', and resembles the embryo in the first stage of its growth³ It is forbidden to eat or drink in the house of those who take wine, meat and honey, and even to use any utensils belonging to them⁴ Further, one who observes the mūlagunas should always avoid water brought in waterskins, oil kept in leather flasks, and women who are not in a fit state for vows⁵

In connection with the taboo on meat, we are told that some object even to the eating of beans and pulses, as these, too, according to them, are flesh, being endowed with life like the bodies of camels, sheep and other animals Somadeva, however, rejects this view, and cites a verse to the effect that flesh may constitute the body of an animate object, but the body of any animate object is not necessarily composed of flesh, just as the Neem is a tree, but any tree is not Neem⁶

The Uttaragunas are twelve in number, and comprise the five Anuvratas, the three Gunavratas and the four Śikṣāvratas The Anuvratas are treated in detail and fully illustrated with elaborate stories in VII 26-32. They consist of limited vows to renounce severally injury, stealing, falsehood, lust and greed.⁷

The vices against which these vows are directed cover a wide field, being classified into different categories. Theft, for example, includes misappropriation of deposits, as shown by the story of Śrībhūti and Bhadrāmītra (see Chap. XVI). It is noteworthy that the early Christians, too, included this among the more serious violations of the moral law. Pliny who was sent as legate to Bithynia in 111 A. D. reports in his ninety-sixth letter to the Emperor Trajan that the Christians 'bound themselves with an oath, not for any crime but not to commit theft or robbery or adultery, not to break their word, and not to deny a deposit when demanded'. Dealing with the question of injury, Somadeva enunciates a positive view of ahimsā and defines himsā as destruction of living creatures through error of judgement, and ahimsā as the protection afforded to them¹ It follows, therefore, that animals must not be killed for the purpose of worshipping the gods or the Manes, or entertaining one's guests, or in any mystic rites, or for medicinal purposes or out of fear this constitutes the vow of *ahimsā*²

All liquids should be strained through a cloth before use to avoid any possible injury to living creatures, and one should for the same reason give up also eating at night³ Rice gruel (or pickles), syrups, unhusked paddy, flowers, fruits, roots and leaves, being the breeding ground of living organisms, should not be acquired for use nor anything that is frequented by the latter⁴ Hollow stalks and reeds should be avoided as well as creepers and bulbs resorted to by diverse creatures⁵ Herbs or vegetables should be taken when no longer raw, after splitting them into two sections, and all kinds of pulses and beans which are cooked entire should also be avoided⁶

Somadeva then enumerates certain qualities which should be cultivated to realise the ideal of ahimsā They are martī, pramoda, kārunya and mādhyasthya Martī is the disposition not to cause suffering to any one by any physical act or thoughts or words⁷ Pramoda is affection coupled with respect for men eminent for their virtues and religious austerities⁸ Kārunya is the will to help the poor, while Mādhyasthya is an equitable attitude, free from pleasure and displeasure, towards those who are devoid of any merit⁹ The supreme quality of kindness is emphasized by declaring that virtue is light and sin darkness, and sin cannot abide in a person crowned with the rays of kindness¹⁰ Ahimsā is thus a positive virtue, and resolves into jīva-dayā or compassion for living creatures, which by itself is as efficacious as all good words combined The effect of the latter is like the result of agricultural labour, while that of the former is like the miraculous results produced by the Cintāmani gem¹¹

Speaking of theft, Somadeva defines it as taking possession of another's property, not being given by the owner, with the exception of such things which may be used by all¹ It is permissible to take possession of ungiven property only at the death of one's kinsmen, in case of the living, specific permission for the purpose is necessary.² Those who take the vow of non-stealing must not take anything that is the property of others 'whether in a house or in the street or on water or in the woods or on the hills'³ With regard to objects of unknown ownership, the king alone has the right to acquire them so that the produce of mines, large and small, belongs to none but the king.⁴ Falsification of measures, abetment of theft, receiving of stolen property, and the accumulation of wealth in war time are obstacles to the vow of non-stealing⁵

Somadeva mentions various degrees of truth and falsehood Firstly, that which is to some extent true, though on the whole false, as when we say in common parlance, 'he cooks food or weaves cloths'⁶ Secondly, what is to some extent false, though on the whole true, as when a man, after promising to give something at the end of a fortnight, gives it after a month or a year. Thirdly, that which is in all respects true. Fourthly, that which is completely false, as when a man promises to give something which he does not possess⁷ The fourth item should always be avoided, but the transactions of everyday life are founded on the other three, and sometimes even a false statement ceases to be false if it pleases one's preceptor and others. Divulging⁸ of secrets, slander, backbiting, forgery and perjury are obstacles to truth⁹ One should not also talk about the wives of others nor speak against the king nor indulge in anti-social talks one should take care not to make any unfounded statement¹ Exaggeration, fault-finding and indecent speech must be avoided, and one should always speak words that are 'noble, beneficial and concise'.² One should not praise oneself nor calumniate others. one should not be jealous of the merits of others when they really exist and describe those of oneself which do not exist at all³

Somadeva appears in certain circumstances to attach greater importance to self-preservation and philanthropic considerations than to speaking out the truth. He opines that the truth must not be spoken if it is likely to endanger others and bring inevitable ruin to oneself⁴. This can only mean that the truth need not always be revealed, if by so doing one can stave off one's own ruin and that of others. Somadeva, however, points out that the effective power of truthful speech is based on the inherent validity of truth itself, and what a truthful man says is on all occasions valid⁵.

It is evident that Somadeva lays as much emphasis on doing good to others as on speaking the truth, if not more. Doing good to others seems to him to be the most natural thing to do, and he fails to understand why people are bent on making others unhappy, since to make others happy is to make oneself happy⁶. To harbour evil thoughts against others is to injure oneself, and Somadeva expresses the idea by saying that 'even while the mind spreads darkness over others, it injects streams of darkness into its veins'.⁷ One should accordingly be always merciful and always devoted to the good of others, be of pleasant nature and pleasant manners, do what is pleasant and speak what is pleasant⁸. It is also a sin to withhold spiritual knowledge from any one who asks for it.⁹

Somadeva then discusses the question of brahman or chastity, and defines it as regarding all women except one's wife or concubine as one's mother, sister or daughter (according to their age).¹ It is also defined as something, the maintenance of which leads to the growth of qualities like ahimsā or non-injury.² In the Realm of Dharma³ men are by nature temperate in their sexual desires, and one should therefore remain content with one's married wife, and leave alone the wives of others, female relations, and nuns.⁴ Study, meditation and the practice of virtue are out of the question so long as the fire of sexual desire burns in the mind.⁵ Worldly pleasures should be enjoyed in moderation, like food, to satisfy only physical needs so as to avoid excessive longing for them.⁶ The vow of chastity is spoilt by illicit relation with women, unnatural methods of sexual enjoyment, arrangement of other people's marriages and preoccupation with the art of love.⁷ Wine, meat, gambling, music with song and dance, personal decoration, intoxication, libertines and aimless wandering these ten are concomitants of sexual passion.⁸ One should be careful not to excite oneself by erotic acts, aphrodisiac potions and erotic literature.⁹ It should be remembered that men are never satiated with worldly pleasures, just as fire is never satiated with sacrificial oblations or the ocean with the influx of waters.¹⁰

Pamgraha, the subject of the fifth Anuvrata, is attachment to worldly objects, and it should always be curtailed. The attachment may be to both outer and inner objects, the former being ten and the latter fourteen. The outer objects are arable land, corn, money, habitation, clothing and the like, couch and seat, servants, cattle and household articles. The inner objects are false doctrines, the three kinds of inclinations (feminine inclinations, masculine inclinations and inclinations common to both the sexes) the six kinds of feelings, viz, the sense of the laughable, pleasure, displeasure, sorrow, fear and disgust, and the four passions anger, pride, decent and greed¹ The transient character of the body and the objects of the world, property, wife and children, ought to convince us of the vanity of our desires Wretched and miserable is the man who uses his wealth for selfish enjoyment and not for the cultivation of virtue, and supremely wealthy are those who do not desire to acquire what they have not got nor rejoice when they have acquired it² Nothing but sin results from the concentration of the mind on wealth, and acquisition through greed of more than one's legitimate share of wealth or property destroys the vow to renounce *parigraha*³ The man, who is free from desire for both the outer and inner objects of attachment, is fit to obtain the bliss of heaven and salvation.⁴

XI) The three Gunavratas are next described (VII 33), but they are not illustrated with stories, like the five Anuvratas The Gunavratas are Digvirati, Deśavirati and Anarthadandavirati. The first two consist of vows to restrict one's movements to a fixed point in a particular direction or in a particular place, preparatory to restraining the mind from external objects by renouncing injury, greed, indulgence and similar propensities⁵ These vows constitute a scheme of preliminary self-restraint designed to secure moral purity and establish mental equilibrium with regard to the objects of the world.

The third Gunavrata is abstention from the Anarthadandas, which comprise all accessories of violence and all agencies and means of injury leading to slaughter, capture or confinement, and are so called because they contribute to the prevalence of strife and discord. The Anartha-dandas include birds and animals like cocks, hawks, peacocks, cats, vicious elephants and ichneumons, and such means of injury as poison, spears, arms, fire whips, nooses and tethers. The person who takes a vow to observe this particular Gunavrata should not therefore keep noxious animals nor use any implement designed to cause injury or loss of life. The Anarthadandas cover a wide field and include also sinful gossip, evil thoughts, sports involving loss of life, futile occupations, doing harm to others, jealousy, and all acts that cause grief and mourning to one's fellow creatures¹ It will be seen that the third Gunaviata is designed to supplement the great vow of Ahimsā, and Somadeva goes on to say that, by renouncing the Anāthadandas, the devotee earns the friendship of all creatures and becomes their lord² Deception and violence practised at the instance of others, the overloading of beasts of burden, and causing excessive suffering to them amount to violation of this vow³

XII) The four Śikṣāviatas are treated in detail in Book VIII, which practically brings to an end Somadeva's masterly discourse on the Jaina religion. They are sāmāyika or customary worship, prośadhōpāsana or religious fasting, nyama or limitation of worldly enjoyment, and dāna or charity.

We have in our work a comprehensive treatment of sāmāyika or the Jaina system of worship, which primarily resolves itself into the worship of Arhats, that is, the all-holy and omniscient Tīrthamkaras or Patriarchs. The worship is of two kinds according as it is done with or without the use of idols.

a) The kind of worship in which idols are dispensed with is regulated by what is known as samaya-samācāra-vidhi, which prescribes the adoration of certain entities, concrete and abstract, held sacred by Jainism. They are the Five Paramesthins or Exalted Beings and the Three Jewels (Right Belief, Right Knowledge and Right Conduct) All these should be visualized on a piece of birch bark or cloth or wooden board or a slab of stone or on sand or the earth or in the air or in one's heart.⁴ The salutations and hymns accompanying the votive offerings are composed by Somadeva himself in ornate prose and verse, and they rank high in Jaina devotional literature.

The Five Paramesthins are adored first. They are, according to Somadeva's interpretation, the Arhat, that is, one of the Tīrthamkaras or Patriarchs endowed with superhuman qualities, the Siddha or one who has realised within himself the luminous presence of the Infinite Soul, the Ācārya or the teacher who regulates the social order according the principles of Jainism, the Upādhyāya or the learned preceptor who has mastered the sacred lore, and the Sādhū or the devotee bent on salvation and engaged in rigorous austerities in the face of insuperable obstacles. It may be added that the doctrine of the Paramēsthins is a cardinal feature of Jainism, which offers to some extent to be a cult of the superman in the sphere of religion, and reserves its highest honours for the best of men who uphold religion and society according to the tenets of the Jaina faith.

The Paramēsthins as well as the Three Jewels are invoked in our work in elaborate, long-winding prose salutations, each followed by a supplementary verse, some of which will be found reproduced in Chapter IV. Somadeva refers in this connection to the eightfold worship of the Paramēsthins and the Three Jewels ¹

The prose invocations are followed by a considerable number of verses in praise of Right Faith, Right Knowledge, and Right Conduct, the Arhat, the Siddha, the Ācārya, and Śāntinātha, one of the the Jinas or Tirthamkaras. Most of these eulogies are couched in an elevated style and will be found in the chapter on Somadeva's verse

b) The worshipper may also use an image of the Arhat, and such worship consists of six items, viz. bathing and adoration of the idol, hymns, silent prayer (japa), meditation, and the adoration of the presiding goddess of the scriptures (Śrūtadevatā). The first two items, ceremonial bathing and adoration of the idol, are closely interconnected, and illustrated by Somadeva with a series of highflown verses in praise of Jina, designed to accompany each successive stage of the ritual. The various stages of the worship proper are prastāvanā (prelude), purāḥarāma (preliminary arrangements), sthāpanā (placing the idol on the altar), samudhāpana (formal installation of the idol), pūjā (obeisance and offerings), and pūjāphala (declaration of the results accruing from the worship of Jina). The idol is bathed with fragrant water, clarified butter, and the juice of vines, dates, sugarcanes, old myrobalans, areca-nuts, and Piyāla fruits as well as coconut-milk,² and anointed with various pastes and compounds made from sandal, aloe wood, cardamoms, cloves and Kamkola berries³. Four pitchers filled with water and decorated with flowers and leaves are kept ready for the bathing ceremony.⁴ The sacred Nandyāvarta and Svastika emblems, fruits, flowers, unbroken rice, water, handfuls of Kuśa grass, and earthen vessels are revolved in a circular fashion before the idol this being the ceremony known as nīlājānā.¹ After a final bath (avabhrthasnāna),² the worshipper should present to the idol Kalama rice, havis, lights, incense, flowers and fruits. White parasols, fly-whisks and mirrors are among the articles used in the worship of the idol.

The benign influence of the worship of Jina is expressed in the following benediction

'Let a king, having acquired glory by dint of virtue, be for the sake of Virtue, favourable to the practice of the virtues and those who are devoted to Virtue. Let the people, too, obtain at will the highest prosperity, ever blessed with the religious merit accruing from the worship of Lord Jina's feet.'

c) The ritual of worship is followed by the singing of hymns in praise of Jina. The next item is Japa or the repetition of the famous Pañcaparamesthi-mantra consisting of thirtyfive letters

“गमो अरहताण, गमो सिद्धाणं, गमो आयरियाण, गमो उवज्झायाण, गमो लोए सव्वसाहूणं ।”

This is the sarvākṣara-mantra. Somadeva refers also to the nāmākṣara formula consisting only of the names of the five Paramesthins,¹ the mukhyākṣara formula consisting of the initial letters of the names of the Paramesthins,² and formulas consisting of a single letter such as *Om*³ or अ, but he prefers the one consisting of thirtyfive letters as the most authoritative⁴. The counting of the letters is to be done with a rosary composed of lotus seeds or golden beads or sunstones or gems, and the counting may also be done with flowers or on the finger-joints⁵. The formula is to be repeated in full, very clearly, with stress on the final *anusvāras*⁶. The repetition of the mantra may be vocal or mental, the latter method being the more efficacious. Great mystic value is attached to this formula which is eloquently praised by our author.

d) Japa is followed by dhyāna or meditation. The thirtyninth section of Book VIII deals with this important subject, and belongs, in fact, to a type of Jaina mystic literature represented by such works as Kundakunda's Mokkhaṭṭhapaṭṭha and Niyamasāra, Samādhisataka, Yogindu's Paramātmaprakāśa, Śubhacandra's Jñānārnava and Devasena's Ārādhana-sāra. There are different kinds of dhyāna, but the fundamental basis of the Jaina system of meditation is the contemplation and realisation of the true nature of the Self. It is necessary to remember at the outset that Jaina doctrine recognises three kinds of Self bahurātmā or the outer

Self, antarātmā or the inner Self, and paramātmā or the higher Self Kundakunda says in his Mokkhaṭṭhā that the external Self consists of the sense organs, the inner Self is the consciousness that the soul is distinct from the body, and the higher Self is the emancipated soul free from the impurities of *Karma*¹ The paramātmā or the higher Self is the sole object of meditation, and it is essential to note that it is not the universal Soul of Vedānta, but the pure and all-knowing soul in each individual, circumscribed and obscured for the time being by the hindrances of karma. Jaina meditation is not merely contemplation but realisation of the Self, which is the same thing as liberation or the emancipated existence of the individual soul. As Kundakunda says, the Yogin by contemplating the paramātmā diverts himself of sin-producing greed and acquires no new karma firm in right conduct and right faith, he contemplates the Self and reaches the supreme goal (ibid verses 48, 49)²

Somadeva begins by saying that the prescribed process of meditation should be sedulously practised by one who desires to contemplate the Supreme Light and attain 'that eternal abode', that is, the abode of the emancipated souls at the top of the universe, as conceived by Jainism. The Supreme Light (paramajyotiḥ) is the higher Self or paramātmā, and the expression is often used in this sense in Jaina literature, e g, in Jñānārṇava 31. 8,³ 41,⁴ 32. 35⁵ etc.

Somadeva mentions two broad divisions of meditation, sabījadhyāna and abījadhyāna. In sabījadhyāna the mind is like a lamp, unshaken by the gusts of external and internal delusion, and cheers up at the sight of the Truth⁶ In abījadhyāna the mental current reaches a stage when it becomes devoid of conscious thought, and the Self sparkles within itself.⁷ In other words, the mind is at work in sabījadhyāna, but ceases to function in abījadhyāna, leaving the Self to discover itself. The latter is the higher kind of contemplation, of which Somadeva describes the main characteristics. He says that when the five senses sink into themselves and the mind is submerged, the Light dawns on the inner Self. Meditation consists in mental concentration, the Self meditates and reaps the consequences, the Light of the Self is the object of meditation, and the subjugation of the senses is the means to accomplish it. Lack of strength does not remove obstacles nor does lack of stamina lead to eternal life. One should therefore contemplate the higher Self (param brahma) without any sense of weakness.¹ Two points may be noted in this connection. First, while there cannot be meditation without mental concentration, the destruction of the senses and specially the activity of the mind is the primary condition of self-realisation. Devasena's Ārādhanaśāra, which elaborates the point, remarks, for instance, that the Self ātmanā becomes the higher Self (paramātmā) when the activity of the mind is destroyed.² Yogīndu in his Paramātmaprakāśa (verse 31) describes the higher Self as mindless (amanu), and the devotee is asked to meditate on the infinite and divine Self by suppressing the mind.³ Super-mental consciousness is the goal aimed at, and the vision of the Light is said to appear only when the senses are subdued and the mind is at a standstill. Pūjapāda says in his Samādhisataka (verse 30) that what one visualizes for a moment after controlling all the senses, with the inner Self motionless and calm, is the reality underlying the higher Self.⁴ Somadeva says in a mystic verse, which, if we understand it correctly, seems to mean that when the swan of the mind (i.e. the inner Self) is bereft of mental activity and the swan of the soul (i.e. the higher Self) is steady in every respect, the swan of knowledge becomes the swan of the lake of visible phenomena in their entirety.⁵ There seems to be here a reference to what Yogīndu calls hamsācāra (2. 170), which is explained as the passionfree purity of the soul concomitant with infinite knowledge and other attributes.⁶

Secondly, the use of the expression param brahma in the sense of the higher Self is another instance of Jaina adaptation of Vedantic terminology. Somadeva uses the expression several times,⁷ and other examples are frequently found in Yogīndu's Paramātmaprakāśa.⁸

Meditation is always difficult. Just as gems, though found in the earth, are not found everywhere, similarly, meditation, though it depends upon individual effort, is not possible for everybody.¹ The duration of dhyāna is only an antarmuhūrta, and it is difficult to attain a state of mind, steadfast in meditation and free from vibration.² But dhyāna, though it lasts only for such a short time, firm in the soul, totally destroys one's accumulated karma, just as a stroke of lightning rends asunder a hill in a moment.³ There are five factors which contribute towards Yoga or meditation: indifference to the world, maturity of knowledge, lack of attachment, a steadfast mind and ability to endure the privations of hunger, thirst, grief, swoon, old age and death.⁴ The obstacles to Yoga are mental suffering, disease, error, carelessness, idleness, confusion, lack of success, attachment and fickleness.⁵ He who practises meditation should be free from anger and pleasure, and remain indifferent, like a clod of earth, both to one who pierces him with thorns and one who smears him with sandal-paste.⁶ He should maintain a uniform attitude towards gain and loss, home and woodland, friend and foe, the pleasant and the unpleasant, happiness and misery.⁷ He should be deeply learned in sacred lore regarding the higher Self, endowed with fortitude, goodwill, and maintain constant silence except for words pleasant and true.⁸

Somadeva then refers to the four kinds of dhyāna mentioned in Tattvārthasūtra, ch. IX: ārta, raudra, dharmya and sukla. Ārtadhyāna is of four kinds: contemplation of the presence of an unpleasant object and the anxiety to get rid of it, contemplation of the loss of a pleasant object and the anxiety to regain it, constant thought of pain or disease and the desire to remove it, and the anxiety to enjoy unattained objects of pleasure. Raudradhyāna is also of four kinds according as it is preoccupied with thoughts of injury, falsehood, theft and the preservation of the means of enjoyment. Ārtadhyāna and Raudradhyāna should be avoided by all means they are, as it were, gates barring the entry of the Three Jewels and effective barriers in the path of liberation, steps leading to hell and wings obscuring the vision of the truth. The tree of rebirth prodigiously grows as long as even a vestige of these two dhyānas remains in the mind.⁹

Somadeva then deals with Dharmyadhyāna and Sukladhyāna. He who practises Dharmyadhyāna should ponder over the fundamental principles of Jainism, carefully considering the authoritative means of knowledge, and the various standpoints and aspects¹ Dharmyadhyāna is of four kinds ājñānāvacaya or discerning the truth on the basis of absolute faith in the scriptures composed by Jina, apāyāvacaya or pondering on the means of making people abstain from wrong belief, knowledge and conduct, vipāḥlavacaya or pondering over the consequences of the eight kinds of karma, and samsthānavacaya or pondering over the nature and constitution of the universe. Somadeva gives examples of all the varieties of Dharmyadhyāna. For instance, the devotee may reflect on ājñā in the following manner: 'Just as there is no mystery in the world about pure gold and its working, similarly it is the desire of the wise that there should be no mystery about authoritative scriptures. But the scriptures (of other faiths) fail to convince even persons of scanty intelligence like myself. How can they help the creatures sinking in the ocean of worldly existence?'² Apāya may be contemplated as follows: 'Alas, the darkness of false doctrines makes man's minds blind to the acceptance of the Three Jewels, even though such a step shines with the rays of reason. Let us hope for the day when, casting off sins, men will see the Truth that puts an end to misery.'³ After reflecting on the constitution of the universe, the devotee should ponder over the consequences of karma. 'There in the universe, upwards, downwards, and athwart, the creatures incessantly wander, like dust, impelled by the gust of their own karma'⁴ It is asserted that he who thus practises Dharmyadhyāna, with his senses and mind subdued, has his darkness dispelled, as if at the rise of the sun.⁵

The next step is Sukladhyāna which is the highest form of meditation. The four stages of this dhyāna are briefly mentioned by Somadeva (P. 394.).

मेद विवर्जिताभेदमभेदं भेदवर्जितम् । ध्यायन् सूक्ष्मक्रियाशुद्धो निष्क्रिय योगमाचरेत् ॥

The first stage, called by Somadeva 'diversity devoid of unity', is prthaktva-vitaraka-vicāra, wherein the devotee is absorbed in the meditation of the Self, but unconsciously allows its different attributes to replace one another. The second stage, called by our author 'unity devoid of diversity', is ekatva vitaraka-

vicāra, wherein the Yogin concentrates on a particular aspect of the Self without any change or variation¹ These two stages of Śukladhyāna are followed by the destruction of the 'destructive' karmas, and the third stage is known as sūkṣma-kriyā-pratipāth, wherein the absorption of the soul in itself still leaves room for minute vibratory movements in the soul The fourth stage is vyuparata-kriyā-nivart, called by Somadeva niskriya yoga, wherein vibration or activity of any kind is totally absent Transcending the body, the Yogin now loses all connection with the mind, and his vital breaths come to an end, while he attains the supreme goal and perfect knowledge.² This is the stage in which the Self becomes the higher Self, and this is mokṣa or liberation, characterized by the destruction of both 'destructive' and 'undestructive' karmas,³ and free from the limitations of birth, a condition in which the Self attains its own qualities⁴ As Kundakunda says in his Samayasāra (verse 196), one who is full of faith and knowledge, and meditates on the Self with undivided attention, soon attains the higher Self, free from karmas,⁵ and liberation is nothing but the attainment or realisation of the higher Self, as pointed out by Yogīndu in Paramātmaprakāśa 2 10.⁶

One who practises meditation should also contemplate the path of the Three Jewels, the rules of conduct, the Anupreksās, and the seven fundamental principles of Jainism, and the personality of Lord Jina⁷ But the contemplation of the Self is the supreme object of dhyāna, and the devotee should reflect within himself that he knows the truth and devotedly believes in the scriptures, and will renounce all external activity and merge the Self in the (higher) Self.⁸ As explained in Jñānārṇava 40.19, the person engaged in meditation should unite the Self with the higher Self, inspired solely by the nature thereof, and impregnating the Self with the qualities of the higher Self⁹

The realisation of the (higher) Self by the Self by means of the (inner) Self, that is, knowledge, is a mode of expression frequently used in Death is ready to swallow even a creature afflicted with a fell disease who can check his greed for one that is beautiful by nature ? If life, youth, association and the joys of creatures were permanent, what wise man would desire to avoid the cycle of births ? One should neither long for life nor invite death, but remain like a servant maintained with wages, not forgetting the limit of one's term Paramount happiness is mine today, standing as I do on the farther shore of darkness, the inner Self thoroughly purified by the light of faith in the fundamental truths. No pleasure or pain is there in the world which I have not experienced, but never have I tasted the nectar of Jaina lore even in a dream No living creature ever becomes subject to the flames of rebirth if he takes, nightly and often, even a drop of that ocean of nectar !

The devotee should also contemplate the nature and glory of Jina, 'who appears to shine in person in the lights of meditation' Somadeva describes in a series of verses the various aspects of the Exalted One's sacred majesty, as a guide to the devotee's own contemplation of the true character of Jina. Portions of the dhyāna are reproduced below (P. 397)

Somadeva then explains the Jaina view of gods. He tells us that the Jaina scriptures have imagined the existence of various deities for the protection of the faith, but whoever considers them equal in matters

1 न सर्वं गच्छति इति शरीरप्रमाणमित्यर्थः —Ms. A

2 यद् वस्तु तत् सर्वम् अतावकगुण त्वत्स्वरूपं न—Ms. A

3 According to Ms. A, त्रयी means successively (1) रत्नत्रय (2) सत्ता, सुख and चैतन्य (3) रात्रि, द्वेष and मोह (4) the three forms of knowledge (मति, श्रुत and अवधि) (5) अतीत, अनागत and वर्तमानकाल (6) उत्पाद, व्यय and प्रौढ्य (7) and the three worlds of worship to Lord Jina, 'the eye of the three worlds', is bound to go to the lowest hell, although it is permissible to honour them as well by allotting to them a portion of the ceremonial offerings. These deities including Indra show favour of their own accord to those who are solely devoted to the Jaina creed, possess right faith, and carefully observe the vows ¹

The contemplation of Lord Jina mentioned above is an attempt to visualize the diverse aspects of the saviour's personality, and is generally known as rupastha dhyāna ². The worshipper may contemplate also the mystic formula signifying the five Paramesthins, namely the Arham mantra, 'the eternal foundation of all branches of knowledge'. While contemplating it the devotee should use the mandara-mudrā and mentally locate the mantra on his forehead ³. We are told that sages contemplate this mantra after studying all the scriptures and performing the greatest austerities, and that any one who mentally repeats it attains all kinds of prosperity whether he is pure or impure, happy or miserable ⁴. It may be noted that this kind of meditation is known as padastha dhyāna, explained in Jñānārṇava (chap. 38), which describes diverse mystic formulas including the Arham mantra ⁵.

The above forms of meditation are called by Somadeva transcendental (lokottara), and he makes also certain observations which he calls popular or general (laukika). The devotee, for instance, should contemplate, the Omkāra formula, mentally locating it on the tip of the nose and concentrating the mind on space between the eyebrows ⁶. He should arouse the mystic lotus inside his navel and move the connected artery, and then direct the four 'winds' or subtle breaths relating to earth, water, fire and air towards the mind. ⁷ It may be noted that the process referred to here is employed in prāṇāyāma, and the devotee has to master the control and regulation of each of the four kinds of vital air, believed to be located, each in its own centre, inside the nostrils. The topic is treated in detail in Jñānārṇava 29 15 ff

Somadeva goes on to say that just as a person, holding a lamp in his hand, looks at something and then puts the lamp aside, similarly the devotee, after having seen the object of knowledge with the help of knowledge, should renounce knowledge (that is, mental action) altogether.¹ Concentration in meditation takes place only when the inflow of all sinful karma ceases, and there can be no question of dhyāna for those whose minds are corrupted by sin.² Milk turned into curds never becomes milk again. Similarly, one whose soul has been purified by the knowledge of the truth is not contaminated by sins again.³

In conclusion, no real difference exists between the individual Self and the blissful higher Self. the former is so called when in bondage, and becomes the blissful higher Self again when it is released from bondage. There is, however, a great difference between the body and the Self, the former extremely impure and the latter extremely pure, and the Self should always be meditated upon after isolating it from the body.⁴ Just as oil remains separate in water, similarly the Self remains apart within the body.⁵ Those who know the truth should by proper means isolate the Self from the body in spite of their long association, just as clarified butter is ingeniously separated from curds.⁶ The relation between the body and the Self, the one with form and the other without form, is like that of a flower and its fragrance, a tree and its shade, and a face and its reflection.⁷

Somadeva's elaborate discourse on dhyāna ends with a definition of *āsana*s or Yogic postures viz padmāsana, virāsana and sukhāsana, and a few hints on the method of acquiring concentration during meditation.

e) The next item of Sāmāyika is the worship of Śrutadevatā or the presiding goddess of the Jaina scriptures, also called Sarasvatī, like her Brahmanical counterpart. Somadeva, following his usual method, gives a

Like an elephant entering the waters of a river, may my intellect plunge into the River of Speech, whose current cleanses the mind of all its impurities, (the River) that rises from the Mount of Syādvāda doctrine, is worthy of the veneration of the sages, and fit to be adored by the gods, having no other refuge.’ The adoration of Śrutadevatā brings to a close the Sāmāyika or customary worship, and Somadeva concludes this section with a devout prayer to Jina (P. 402).

XIII) The second Śikṣāvṛata is Prosadha or religious fasting on four days of the month (the eighth and fourteenth lunar days in each fortnight). He who observes this vṛata should refrain from all sinful actions and practise self-control, and abstaining from bath, perfumes, bodily decoration, ornaments and women, observe fast and devote himself to religious meditation in a temple or on a hill or at home or in the woods¹. The inner spirit cannot become pure without the mortification of the body. what else but fire can purify gold?² Failure to examine and sweep the ground before use, evil

ctions, evil thoughts and abstention from the Āvaśyakas or obligatory duties¹ destroy the efficacy of the Prosadha vow.²

XIV) The third Śikṣāvīrata is the limitation of worldly enjoyment. Enjoyment is of two kinds. Food and other objects which can be used only once are called bhoga, and objects such as ornaments which can be used again and again are known as paribhoga.³ Both kinds of enjoyment should be kept within bounds to prevent 'mental obsession', and one should voluntarily practise abnegation when everything needed comes into one's possession.⁴ Abnegation may be of two kinds, yama and nyama, the former being for life and the latter for a limited period.⁵ Flowers and vegetables containing various living organisms, e.g., onions, Ketakī and Nīmba flowers, and Sūriana roots should be forsaken for life.⁶ One should also avoid ill-cooked and prohibited food as well as food that has come in contact with what got mixed up with living organisms, and food that has not been prepared under one's own supervision.⁷

XV) The fourth Śikṣāvīrata is dāna or charity.⁸ That which contributes towards one's own welfare and promotes the cultivation of the three Jewels in others and brings relief to one's kinsmen as well as others is called dāna.⁹ Some practise charity with a view to attaining bliss in the next world, others to get it in this world, and there are also those who practise charity because it is proper to do so.¹⁰

Dāna or charity is of four kinds, namely, gift of abhaya or protection, gift of food, gift of medicine and gift of sacred lore.¹¹ Of these abhaya is the highest gift, and the wise should always give the first place to affording protection to all living creatures.¹² Next comes the gift of food, and it is the duty of a householder to feed Jain sādhus or holy men

according to the nine-fold canon of hospitality consisting of reception, offering of a high seat, washing of the feet, adoration, salutation, affable speech, affable manners and affable temperament, and, lastly, purity of food.¹ Particular attention should be paid to the quality and purity of the food, which should be seasonable and prepared at home and not brought from another locality nor purchased from the bazar.² Food that has been touched by wicked people or consecrated to gods and Yakshas as well as offerings brought for mystic rites should not be given to the sādhus to eat.³

He who observes the Three Jewels, that is, the cardinal principles of Jainism, is the most deserving of those who are entitled to charity, and anything given to one who is not a follower of the Three Jewels is like seeds sown on barren soil.⁴ In fact, charity practised in favour of those who are attached to false doctrines and wrong conduct leads to evil consequences, like the feeding of serpents with milk.⁵ If one wishes to be charitable towards such people out of pity or from a sense of propriety, one should give them a residual portion of food to be taken away and not feed them in one's house.⁶ Even the sight of them during the reception of Jaina holy men leads to pollution, just as even pure water is contaminated by a vessel containing poison.⁷ One must not live or talk with or accord hospitality to Buddhists, Nāstikas, Sacrificers, ascetics wearing matted hair (Śaivas), Ājīvaka mendicants and others of similar persuasion.⁸ Conversation with people ignorant of the fundamental truths, and corrupted by evil propensities, leads only to a free fight in which the parties belabour each other with sticks and pull each other's hair.⁹

There are five classes of people who are entitled to hospitality: the śāman, the śrāvaka, the sādhu, the śūra and the śāmanadīpaka. The śāman is an adherent of the Jaina faith and may be a layman or a monk. The śrāvaka is one who has an expert knowledge of astrology, incantations, omens and unseen things in general as well as the art of healing. The time for religious functions such as initiation, festivals and installation of idols cannot be fixed without his help, and Somadeva naively asks how the Jaina faith will progress if one has to ask the followers of other religions for information about these matters¹ The sādhu is one who has accomplished religious austerities combined with the observation of the Mūla and Uttara-gunas, that is, the entire range of the Jaina religious vows.² The śūri is the leader of society in the sphere of knowledge as well as the practice of religion, and should be worshipped like a god, since he is like a boat for crossing the ocean of existence³ The śamaya-dīpakas are men who advance the cause of the Jaina faith by their knowledge of the world, poetical faculties and other powers as well as eloquence and skill in disputation⁴

It is useless to test the purity of monks for the purpose of giving them food whether they are good or bad, the householder is purified by the mere act of giving⁵ Besides, householders are in the habit of spending money on so many things that it is not wise to consider the pros and cons of a gift too much⁶ The greater the merits of a monk, the greater should be the respect shown to him, but those who are wealthy should use their money, acquired through luck, to help any follower of the Jaina faith, since a monk, conforming to the standard laid down by the scriptures, may or may not be available for the purpose of charity⁷ The creed established by the great Jaina seers is professed by men of diverse faculties, and does not depend upon any single individual, just as a house does not rest on a single pillar⁸

Dāna is of three kinds. rājasa, tāmāsa and sāttvika Charity accompanied by self-glorification, momentary, casual and lacking in conviction is known as *rājasa*⁹ Charity practised through the agency of servants and slaves without any respect for the recipient or familiarity with him, and without any consideration of merit, is *tāmāsa*¹⁰ Charity is sāttvika when hospitality is spontaneous and the recipient worthy, and when the giver has certain qualities, namely, faith, contentment, reverence, knowledge, liberality, forbearance and ability.¹¹ The sāttvika form of charity is the best, the rājasa comes next, and the tāmāsa is the worst. Somadeva says in this connection that the statement (made by Brahmanical writers) that what is given in this life is recovered by the donor in the next life¹ is entirely false. Cows, for instance, are in the habit of eating water and grass, but they produce milk, something quite different²

It is the duty of householders to remedy the ills of monks and saints, which may be of three kinds—physical ailments, mental worries and external troubles such as the rigours of cold and wind³. If the laity neglect the sufferings of the monks, the latter cannot maintain their spiritual concentration, and the former will render themselves guilty of impiety⁴. While the monks are engaged in expounding and studying the sacred texts, they should be comforted with lodging, food, books and other amenities. The holy texts—the Angas, Pūrvas, Prakīrṇas, Sūktas and the utterances of the Kevalins—would entirely become extinct, if those who know the scriptures thoroughly were to perish on account of neglect⁵. One should therefore help the monks to master the scriptures by sheltering and encouraging them and contributing to their joy, and by providing them with materials necessary for their study⁶. It should be remembered that men, capable of physical labour, for instance, the carrying of arms, are easily available, but those who are endowed with real knowledge are rare like heroes⁷. Knowledge alone can control the mind, like a spear controlling an elephant. Without knowledge, physical labour is nothing but labour that is lost⁸. One who concentrates on knowledge succeeds in external austerities without any effort, but, as a matter of fact, external activities no longer take place when the soul is immersed in knowledge⁹. It is doubtful if a man without knowledge can destroy his karṇa even after ages, but a man who is endowed with knowledge and yoga is sure to destroy his karṇa in a moment.¹⁰ The man whose speech is not refined by the science of words, and whose intellect is not purified by right principles, is like a blind person labouring according to the convictions of others.¹¹

Somadeva mentions at the end of this section the various factors which destroy the value of charity. They are 'instructions to others' to make a gift on one's behalf, that is, lack of personal attention, jealousy at the liberality of others, lack of punctuality (in serving a guest), the practice of depositing food on sentient objects such as lotus leaves or covering it with same¹

XVI) The custom of sallekhanā or fasting unto death is dealt with in VIII 45 Somadeva says that the practice is to be followed when the body is about to perish, like a dry leaf or a lamp without oil² The hour of this last act of life comes when everyday the body loses strength and power of enjoyment, and is beyond remedy³ Self-restraint, study, austerities, worship, and charity all become useless if the mind is not pure at the last hour of life⁴ Just as the training of a king, who has learnt the use of weapons for twelve years, becomes useless if he faints on the battlefield, similarly the past conduct of a saint is of no avail if his mind is impure at the end⁵ One should renounce one's affection for friends, infatuation with riches and illwill towards enemies, and then take proper steps (that is, resort to sallekhanā) after confessing all sins before the head of the congregation⁶ Food should be gradually given up and then beverages, both sweet and pungent, and one should thereafter abstain from everything with one's mind fixed on the five Paramesthins⁷ There are five factors that destroy the efficacy of sallekhanā the desire to live longer, the desire to die to avoid suffering, longing for friends, recollection of past happiness and the desire for happiness in the next life⁸

XVII) In Yasastilaka VIII 44 Somadeva interprets from the Jain point of view a number of Brahmanical terms, which illustrates certain salient features of the Jain outlook in religious matters For instance, a Diksita is not one who kills goats and other animals in sacrifices, but one whose daily sacrifice consists in friendliness towards all creatures⁹ A Srotriya is not one who has external purity, but one who has nothing to do with wicked deeds and wicked men, and is kindly disposed towards all creatures¹⁰ A Hotā is not one who kindles the external fire, but one who casts the fuel of good deeds in the spiritual fire with the formulas of kindness¹ A Sacrificer is defined as one who adores the deity with the flowers of pure thoughts, the mansion of the body with the flowers of vows, and the fire of the mind with the flowers of forbearance² The Veda that pleases the wise is not the one which causes the destruction of all creatures in sacrifices, but the one which clearly makes known the difference between the body and the soul³ The Threefold Lore (i. e. the Veda) is called Trayī, because it destroys the triad of birth, old age and death, the cause of transmigration⁴ A Brāhmana is not one who is blind with the pride of birth, but one who does not destroy life, observes salutary vows, has knowledge, and is without desires and acquisition⁵ The true Pañcāgnisādhaka (one who performs austerities amid five fires) is he who has controlled the five fires lust, anger, pride, deceit and greed⁶ Knowledge is Brahma, kindness is Brahma, and the destruction of lust is Brahma when the soul rests securely on these, a man is called Brahmacārī⁷ A Paramahansa is not an ascetic who eats anything and everything like fire, but one who can (like a hansa, swan) distinguish between karma and the soul, intermingled like water and milk.⁸

XVIII) The 46th section of Book VIII, called Prakīrnaka, which deals with certain miscellaneous topics, brings to a close Somadeva's elaborate discourse on the Jaina religion. It describes chiefly the six daily duties of a householder⁹ worship of the deva i. e. Jina, adoration of the teacher, svādhyāya or study of spiritual lore,¹⁰ tapas or physical and mental activities leading to the purification of the soul by removing external and internal impurities,¹¹ saṁyama or control of the passions and the senses, and the observance of the vows,¹² and dāna or charity. Kasāya (passion) is derived thus (P 416).

‘कषन्ति सतापयन्ति दुर्गसगतिसपादनेनात्मानमिति कषाया क्रोधादय । अथवा यथा विशुद्धस्य वस्तुनो नैवप्रोधादय. कषाया कालुष्यकारिण, तथा निर्मलस्यात्मनो मलिनत्वहेतुत्वात् कषाया इव कषाया ।’

XIX) Stray allusions to Jaina tenets occur occasionally in the course of Utprekās and similes. For example, मनुष्यरूपेण परिणतं धर्मद्वयमिव Book I,

"She mounted at once the ksapakasreni, and, the eight Karmas being destroyed, she attained omniscience at once from the eighth Gunasthāna" "As he was reflecting rightly in this way, having ascended the ksapakasreni and having attained pure meditation, omniscience becomes manifest from the destruction of the destructive Karmas, like the light of the sun from the removal of a mass of clouds."³ A reference of the final stage of religious apprenticeship occurs in the following statement in Book I, p. 135

Śrutasāgara takes this to mean the eleventh Pratimā or stage in the life of a layman, known as uddistatyāga-pratimā, wherein he begs his food and refuses what is specially prepared for him Abhayaruci and Abhayamati are described as being in this stage of religious apprenticeship, as they were too young to lead the rigorous life of Digambara monks.

References occur also to the twenty-two Parīśahas⁴ and other miscellaneous topics The three kinds of Karmandins or monks are mentioned in Book I,⁵ and Śrutasāgara explains the term as referring to Ācārya, Upādhyāya and Sarvasādhū

CHAPTER XI

THE ANUPREKSĀS AND JAINA RELIGIOUS POETRY

Jaina religious poetry, as far as it is represented in Yasastilaka, comprises verses on the Anupreksās, hymns, and what may be loosely called religious ethical verses. Of these the Anupreksā verses are the most important not only from the standpoint of subject-matter, but on account of the place they occupy in Jaina literature and religious thought.

In order to appreciate Somadeva's treatment of the Anupreksās, it will be convenient to explain their religious background, and enumerate the principal literary attempts to define and interpret them before and after his time. The Anupreksās are, roughly speaking, topics of meditation, twelve in number, and cover a wide range of the cardinal teachings of Jainism. They are in the form of reflections on the transient character of things (anityānupreksā), helplessness (aśaranānupreksā), the cycle of rebirth (samsārānupreksā), loneliness (ekatvānupreksā), the distinction between the self and the not-self (anyatvānupreksā), the impurity of the body (asucyanupreksā), the inflow of Karmas (āśravānupreksā), stoppage of the inflow of Karmas (samvarānupreksā), the shedding of Karma (nirjarānupreksā), the constitution of the universe (lokānupreksā), the difficulty of attaining the Right Path consisting of the Three Jewels (bodhidurlabhānupreksā), and the Law expounded by the Arhat (dharmasvākhyātātānupreksā). It may be noted that the Anupreksās are known also as Bhāvanās, specially in Śvetāmbara texts.

Anupreksā means anucintana 'pondering', 'reflection'. Pūjyapāda in his commentary on Tattvārthasūtra 9. 2 explains Anupreksā as 'pondering on the nature of the body and other substances'.¹ Svāmikārtikeyānupreksā (verse 97) defines it as 'pondering on the right principles' (sutacca-cintā anuppehā). The word is used also in connection with Svādhyāya or study of sacred lore, of which anupreksā, pondering on what one has learnt, is an important factor. Pūjyapāda says in his commentary on Tattvārthasūtra 9. 25 adhigatārthasya manasā abhyāśah anupreksā. The word is used in this sense also in Uttarādhyayanāsūtra 29-22, wherein anuppehā, explained as cintanikā in Nemicandra's commentary, is one of the factors of sammatta-parakkama, 'exertion in righteousness', mitigating the power and duration of practically all the Karmas.

The Anupreksās are designed to serve as aids to spiritual progress, produce detachment, and lead the devotee from the realm of desire to the path of renunciation. The Bhāṣya on Tattvārthasūtra 9 7 says that the devotee, after reflecting on the transient character of worldly objects and relationships, loses all attachment to them. This is the purpose of anityānupreksā. He reflects on the fact that there is no escape from death and misery, and the sense of helplessness makes him indifferent to the things of the world and inclines him towards the teachings of the Arhat, this is the purpose of asarānānupreksā and so on. Similarly, Pūjapāda, in his commentary on the same sūtra, says in connection with asucitvānupreksā that the body is impure, and its impurity cannot be removed by bath, perfumes, incense and other means, whereas the contemplation of Right Faith and other principles leads to absolute purity. Thinking like this in all earnestness amounts to asucitvānupreksā. Thus reflecting, the devotee becomes indifferent to the body and concentrates his mind on 'crossing the ocean of births'. In this way the object of each Anupreksā is minutely explained, but the general purpose of the Anupreksās is to make the aspirant averse to the world and concentrate his mind on the Self and its emancipation. The Maranasamāhī, a Jaina canonical text, says that contemplation of the Bhāvanās, that is, the Anupreksās leads to vairāgya or disgust for the world and seems to sum up the Bhāvanās as vairāgya-bhāvanā (verses 636 and 638),¹ and describes them also as producing a strong desire for liberation (verse 571).² The idea of the Anupreksās being the cause of vairāgya is stressed also in Mūlācāra 8. 73,³ and we are told that he who always edifies himself with their help becomes free from Karmas, and being pure, attains the Abode of Purity.⁴ Śubhacandra in his Jñānārṇava 2 5, 6 recommends the Bhāvanās for the attainment of the purity of thoughts (bhāvasuddhi) and the growth of saṃvega (desire for salvation), vairāgya, yama (self-control) and prasama (extinction of the passions). Hemacandra says in Yogasāstra (4 40, 45, 49, 55) that one should vanquish love and hate for the attainment of mental purity which alone shows the way to nirvāṇa, and love and hate can be conquered by means of saṃatva or equanimity, which again is produced by nirmamatva or lack of selfish desires, and one should resort to the Bhāvanās for the purpose of cultivating nirmamatva. Hemacandra concludes by saying that he who ceaselessly preoccupies the mind with the Bhāvanās becomes indifferent to all objects and maintains an even attitude free from love and hate.⁵

5 भावनाभिरविश्रान्तमिति भावितमानस । निर्ममः सर्वभावेषु समत्वमवलम्बते ॥ 4. 110

The Anupreksās have other aspects as well. In Tattvārthasūtra 9. 2 they are mentioned among the agencies that cause Samvara or stoppage of the influx of Karmas, the others being Gupti, Samiti, Dharmma etc. The Anupreksās are also brought into special connection with Dharmya-dhyāna, one of the two forms of spiritual contemplation prescribed by Jain doctrine. In a number of verses quoted by Siddhasena in his commentary on Tattvārthasūtra 9. 38 the Anupreksās are prominently mentioned among the preliminaries to Dharmya-dhyāna¹. According to Śubhacandīa (Jñānārnava 41. 3) the Anupreksās are the leading cause of Dharmya-dhyāna, and the devotee is asked to determine the nature of the Self by implanting them in his mind². Śīvārya in his Bhagavati Ārādhana (verse 1714) goes one step further, and definitely recommends the contemplation of the Anupreksās as a sort of supplementary discipline in the stage of Dharmya-dhyāna known as Samsthānavicaya, consisting in meditation on the constitution of the universe according to the Jain conception³. A similar yet different standpoint is met with in Cāmundarāya's Cāntrasāra. It mentions two kinds of Dharmya-dhyāna, bāhya and ādhyātmika, and classifies the latter into ten varieties including Samsthānavicaya, which is, however, explained as 'investigation of things as they are' (yathāvasthuta-mīmāṃsā) and completely identified with the twelve Anupreksās.

The Anupreksās are thus viewed from different standpoints, but their wider aspect can hardly be mistaken. They are in the nature of reflections on the fundamental facts of life, and remind the devotee of the teachings of the Master on the subject of rebirth, Karma and its destruction, equanimity and self-control, the glory of the Law and the final goal. They are no doubt designed to develop the contemplative faculty of the Yogin, and may be called the starting point of dhyāna. But they have also a great moral significance inasmuch as they are meant to develop purity of thoughts and sincerity in the practice of religion. Kundakunda, for instance, in his Bhāva-prābhṛta (verse 94) exhorts the devotee to contemplate the Anupreksās and the twenty-five Bhāvanās, and asks what is the use of external symbols without inner conviction⁴. The catholic character of the Anupreksās is shown by the fact that they are recommended to monks and laymen alike for contemplation (Maranasamāhi, v. 571). In our work king Yaśorgha ponders on them on the eve of his abdication and retirement from the world. Somaprabha tells us in his Kumārapālāpratibodha that Kumārapāla, after receiving instruction in the twelve Bhāvanās, experienced a feeling of indifference to the world and used to reflect on them while looking after the affairs of the kingdom¹ Amitagati in his S'rāvakācāra 14. 82 says in conformity with earlier texts that he who meditates on the Anupreksās constantly with devotion comprehends all the fundamental facts and attains liberation, after getting rid of his Karma

The human and spiritual appeal of the Anupreksās accounts for their popularity, as evinced by the numerous attempts made to describe and interpret them in Piākrit and Sanskrit verse and occasionally also in prose. A more or less extensive literature may be said to have grown up on the subject, as will be seen from the short sketch given below.

The famous Digambara authority Kundakūṇḍa, who is assigned to the beginning of the Christian era, is perhaps the earliest writer to deal with the Anupreksās as an independent subject, being the author of a treatise called Bārāsa Anuvekkhā, 'The twelve Anupreksās', containing 91 verses in Piākrit (Jaina Śaurasenī). The treatment here is simple yet authoritative, and has influenced later writers on the subject. Connected with this work is the account of the Anupreksās in Mūlācāra (Chap 8) in 76 verses in Prākṛit. The work is attributed to Vattakera who is sometimes identified with Kundakūṇḍa himself.² While these may be the earliest metrical efforts to offer a systematic exposition of the Anupreksās, there is an exhaustive treatment of them in a canonical text called Maranasamāhi, one of the Paññas, which devotes 70 verses (569-639) to the Bhāvanās. While enumerating the Bhāvanās, it mentions Uttama Guṇas instead of Dharma (v 573), obviously meaning thereby Uttama Kṣamā, Uttama Mārdava etc., being the characteristics of Dharma.

The three ancient works mentioned above are composed in a more or less similar style, and there is also occasional similarity in thought, and the subject of their inter-relationship requires critical investigation (Mūlācāra 8. 13; Maranasamāhi, verse 590, Bārāsa Anuvekkhā, verse 22, Maranasamāhi, verse 588):

2 A. N. Upadhye Pravacanasāra, Intro., p. 26

The next important treatise to deal with the subject is Svāmīkārttikeyānupreksā of Kārttikeya, who devotes the entire work of 489 verses in Prākṛit to the elucidation of the Anupreksās. It is a work of considerable merit, but the treatment of the subject is disproportionate inasmuch as more than 350 verses deal only with Lokānupreksā (115-283) and Dharmānupreksā (302-486). This is due to the fact that Kārttikeya includes in his work many heterogeneous details not usually incorporated in the discussion of the Anupreksās. The date of the author is not certain, but he is assigned to the early centuries of the Christian era.

A comprehensive exposition of the Anupreksās occurs also in Śivārya's Bhagavatī Ārādhana,¹ a devotional work in Śauraseni Prākṛit containing more than 2000 verses, of which (1715-1872) deal with the Anupreksās. Śivārya is an important writer and said to be a disciple of Samantabhadra. He may be identified with Śivakoti who is mentioned in Jinasena's Ādipurāṇa 1.49. That he is considerably earlier than the tenth century is shown by the fact that his Ārādhana was translated into Sanskrit verse by the wellknown writer Amitagatī who flourished towards the end of the tenth century and the beginning of the eleventh. Śivārya's style is simple and lucid, and he uses a large number of interesting similes to illustrate his ideas. For example,

Strings of Rūpakas are also used occasionally

संजमरणभूमीए कम्मरिचमू पराजिणिय सव्व । पावदि संजयजोहो अणोवसं मोक्खरज्जसिरे ॥ 1854

It is not known when Sanskrit verse was first employed to describe the Anupreksās, but Somadeva's account of them in Yasastilaka, Book II in 53 verses composed in the Vasantatilakā metre may be regarded as one of the earliest attempt to expound them in Sanskrit instead of Prākṛit verse. His treatment of the Anupreksās is weighty and compact and full of spiritual fervour, and his verses on the subject are unique in the sense that they are composed by a writer who is not only a learned theologian but a religious poet of no mean order.

1 For a detailed note on the Bhagavatī Ārādhana, see A. N. Upadhye: Bṛhat-kathākośa Intro. pp. 50 ff

Far more comprehensive in treatment and simpler in style is the exposition of the Anupreksās in Śubhacandra's Jñānārṇava, which calls them Bhāvanās and devotes more than 190 verses to the subject. Śubhacandra may be assigned to about the eleventh century, and his Jñānārṇava is an authoritative work on Yoga¹. Although the author disclaims poetical pretensions (1. 19), he handles Sanskrit verse with remarkable felicity and sometimes employs elaborate metres. The following verses from the section on Anitya-bhāvanā will illustrate his style.

गीयते यत्र सानन्दं पूर्वाह्णे ललितं गृहे । तस्मिन्नेव हि मध्याह्ने सद्यः खमिह रुचते ॥

गगननगरकल्प संगम वल्लभानां जलदपटलतुल्यं यौवनं वा धनं वा ।

सुजनसुतशरीरादीनि विबुधलानि क्षणिकमिति समस्तं विद्धि संसारवृत्तम् ॥

Śubhacandra concludes his exposition with an eloquent verse in praise of the Bhāvanās

एता द्वादशभावनाः खलु सखे सख्योऽपवर्गश्रियस्तस्याः संगमलालसैर्धटयितुं मैत्री प्रयुक्ता बुधैः ।

एतासु प्रगुणीकृतासु लियत मुक्त्यङ्गना जायते सानन्दाः प्रणयप्रसन्नहृदया योगीश्वराणां मुदे ॥

Amitagatī, whose Subhāsitaratnasamdoha and Dharmapariksā are wellknown works, wrote also a S'rāvakācāra 'Duties of laymen', of which the fourteenth chapter deals with the Anupreksās in 84 verses composed in a variety of metres (Rathoddhata, Dodhaka, Upajāti, Puspitāgrā, Vasanta-talakā etc.). The following verses may serve as specimens

यौवनं नगनदीस्यदोषम शारदाशुद्विलासजीवितम् ।

पातकमाश्रवति स्थिररूपं सभृतिमात्मवत्ता न यतीनाम् ।

Vādibhasimha, who flourished in the early years of the eleventh century and wrote the poem Kṣattracūdāmanī and the prose romance Gadyacintāmaṇi, devotes more than fifty verses to the Anupreksās in the former work (11. 28-80). The verses are rather pedestrian in style and composed in the Sloka metre. In the last verse the Self is exhorted to have abiding faith in the exquisitely pure Jaina religion.

तवामन्त्रात्मनीनेऽस्मिन् जैनधर्मेऽतिनिर्मले । स्ववीयसी रुचिः स्वेयादा मुक्तेर्मुक्तिदायिनी ॥

After Vādibhasimha we may mention Hemacandra, who flourished in the twelfth century. He deals with the Anupreksās, called by him

Bhāvanās, in his Yogasūtra 4 55-110, besides devoting a large number of supplementary verses (antaraslokāḥ) to the topic in his own commentary on the work. There are, for instance, only three main verses in the text on Samsāra-bhāvanā, while there are 90 supplementary verses in the svopajñā commentary, containing an imaginative description of the grief and despair of the gods at the prospect of their fall from heaven (vv 69-89). The following striking verse also occurs in the commentary (Verse 53, op cit.)

साच्छैशवे मातृमुखस्तारुण्ये तरुणीमुख । वृद्धभावे सुतमुखो मूर्खो नान्तर्मुख कश्चित् ॥

Hemacandra eloquently describes the universal discipline and equilibrium maintained by the sustaining power of Dharma in the verses on Dharma-svākhyāta-bhāvanā (4. 96 ff.)

After Hemacandra comes Siddhasena Sūri who wrote his Sanskrit commentary on Nemicaṇḍia's Prākṛit work Pravacanāsāroddhāra in 1192 A D¹. In this commentary Siddhasena devotes more than 130 verses to the Bhāvanās, some of them being composed in elaborate metres. Siddhasena's exposition is not without literary merit, as will be seen from the following specimens

सुमतिरमति श्रीमानश्री सुखी सुखवर्जित सुतनुरतनुः स्वाम्यस्वामी प्रियः स्फुटमप्रियः ।
नृपतिरनुपः स्वर्गी तिर्थङ्ग नरोऽपि च नारकस्तदिति बहुधा नृत्यत्यस्मिन् भवी भवनाटके ॥
यत् प्रोद्दाममदान्धसिन्धुरघट साम्राज्यमासाद्यते यन्निःशेषजनप्रमोदजनक सपद्यते वैभवम् ।
यत् पूर्णेन्दुसमद्युतिर्गुणगणः संप्राप्यते यत् पर सौभाग्यं च विजृम्भते तदखिल धर्मस्य लीलायितम् ॥

Among later accounts of the Anupreksās one of the most noteworthy is that of Āśādhara in his Anagāradharmāmṛta 6 57-82. He wrote this work about the middle of the thirteenth century and added to it a svopajñā commentary after the manner of Hemacandra. He employs elaborate metres, and a good specimen of his style is furnished by the following verse on the rarity of Bodhi or the attainment of the Right Path

दुष्प्रापं प्राप्य रत्नत्रयमखिलजगत्सारमुत्सारयेयं नो चेत् प्रज्ञापराध क्षणमपि तदर विप्रलब्धोऽक्षधूतैः ।
तत् किञ्चित् कर्म कुर्यां यदनुभवभवत्केशसंक्लेशसंविद्बोधेर्विन्देय वार्तामपि न पुनरनुप्राणनास्या कुतस्त्वा ॥

A brief but interesting exposition of the Bhāvanās in Apabhrāmśa verse is found in Somaprabha's Kumārāpālupratibodha written in 1184 A D² on the conversion of king Kumārāpāla of Gujarat to Jainism and his instruction in that religion by Hemacandra. The work is written in Prākṛit, but certain portions are in Sanskrit and in Apabhraṃśa, among them the verses on the Bhāvanās towards the end of the third chapter. The following two verses are cited as specimens

We are not concerned with the various comments on the Anupreksās in prose, but it may be pointed out that they are elaborately expounded in the Bhāṣya on Tattvārthasūtra 9.7 and Pūjyapāda's commentary thereon. The Anupreksās are dealt with in detail also in Cāmundarāya's Cāmrāsāra written in prose in the eleventh century¹. This account is based on that of Pūjyapāda who is sometimes copied verbatim, but the description of the Āsraṇanupreksā is interesting as containing a reference to the story of Yaśodhara and Amṛtamati. A detailed interpretation of the Anupreksās is found also in Brahmadeva's commentary on Nemicandra Siddhāntacakravartin's Dravyasaṃgraha (verse 35). Brahmadeva has been assigned to the thirteenth century².

Despite the extent of the literature on the Anupreksās, we do not find in it much originality of thought, as the prevailing characteristics of the various literary attempts to deal with them are rather elaboration and illustration designed to elucidate the cardinal teachings of the Jaina faith. Every writer on the subject seeks to express himself in as striking a manner as possible, and both in point of style and ideas Somadeva's exposition ranks high among the metrical compositions on the twelve Anupreksās. Most of his verses on them are translated below.

1 ANUPREKŚĀ

(Thoughts on the Transient Character of Things)

उत्सृज्य जीवितजल बहिरन्तरेते रिक्ता विशन्ति मरुतो जलयन्त्रकल्पा ।

एकोद्यम जरति यूनि महत्त्वणौ च सर्वकष पुनरय यतते कृतान्त ॥

These (five) life-breaths draw the water of life, like a water-wheel, and leaving it outside, enter the body empty³. Death, the destroyer of all, acts with equal effort on old and young, great and small (2. 105)

1 Winternitz History of Indian Literature, p. 387

2 A. N. Upadhye Paramātmaprakāśa, Introduction, p. 72.

3 The process of breathing is represented as a sort of gradual exhaustion of the vital force, bringing death nearer and nearer.

उच्चैः पदं नयति जन्तुमथ पुनस्त वात्येव रेणुनिचय चपला विभूतिः ।

श्राम्यत्यतीव जनता वनितासुखाय ता सूतवत् करगता अपि विह्वन्ते ॥

Unstable Prosperity raises a man high and brings him low again, as a whirlwind does a heap of dust. People strive hard for the pleasure afforded by lovely women, but the latter slip away, like mercury, even when securely possessed (2. 107)

शूरं विनीतमिव सज्जनवत् कुलीन विद्यामहान्तमिव धार्मिकमुन्सृजन्ती ।

चिन्ताङ्गवरप्रसवभूमिरियं हि लोक लक्ष्मी खलक्षणसखी कलुषीकरोति ॥

The goddess of wealth forsakes the valiant and the humble, the good and the highborn, the learned and the pious. A moment's friend, like a villain, she is a source of the fever of anxiety and corrupts the world (2. 108).

वाचि भ्रुवोर्दक्षि गतावलकावलीषु यासा मन कुटिलतान्तादिनीतरङ्गाः ।

अमर्तर्न मान्त इव दृष्टिपथे प्रयाता कस्ता करोतु सरलास्तरलायताक्षी ॥

Who can render women sincere, women with large and nimble eyes? The crookedness of their minds seems to overflow their hearts, like the waves of a river, and comes into view in their words, eyebrows and eyes, in their gait, and in the curls of the hair (2. 109)

सहारबद्धकवलस्य यमस्य लोके क पश्यतोहरविधेरवधिं प्रयात ।

यस्माज्जगत्त्रयपुरीपरमेश्वरोऽपि तन्नाहितोद्यमगुणे विधुरावधानः ॥

Who in the world hath ever passed beyond the range of Death that acts like a robber, ready to clutch and destroy? Even Jina, the overlord of all the three worlds, is powerless against Death when the latter exerts himself (2. 110).

इत्थ क्षणक्षयद्रुताशमुखे पतन्ति वस्तूनि वीक्ष्य परितः सुकृती यतात्मा ।

तत् कर्म किंचिदनुसर्तुमथ यतेत यस्मिन्नसौ नयनगोचरता न याति ॥

Thus seeing on all sides the things falling into the destructive fire of Death, the virtuous self-restrained man should strive to pursue that line of conduct wherein Death appears nevermore (2. 111)

2. AŚĀRAṆĀNUPREKSĀ

(Thoughts on one's Helplessness)

दत्तोदयेऽर्थनिचये हृदये स्वकार्ये सर्वं समाहितमति पुरतः समास्ते ।

जाते त्वपायसमयेऽम्बुपतौ पतन्ने पोतादिव द्रुतवत् शरणं न तेऽस्ति ॥

When thy wealth is on the increase and thy heart bent on spending,¹ everybody stands to attention before thee. But, like a bird flying from a ship on the sea, thou hast none to save thee at the hour of death (2. 112).

बन्धुव्रजैः सुभटकोटिभिरासवर्गैर्मन्त्रास्त्रतन्त्रविधिभिः परिरक्ष्यमाणः ।

जन्तुर्बलादधिबलोऽपि कृतान्तदूतैरानीयते यमवशाय वराक एकः ॥

1 Śrutasaṅgāra says 'स्वकार्ये धनकार्ये हृदये चित्ते वर्तमाने मति'

Even when a man is stronger than an army, being protected by multitudes of kinsmen, millions of warriors, and trusty followers with all the resources of counsel, arms and troops, he is brought under the sway of Death by the latter's messengers—miserable and all alone (2 113).

ममीदृतस्त्व न जातु समस्ति शास्ता त्वत् पर परमवाससमग्रबोधे ।

तस्या स्थिते न्वयि यतो दुरितोपतापसेनेयमेव सुविधे विधुराश्रया स्यात् ॥

Good-natured one, once thou hast attained the full measure of Bodhi (right knowledge, conduct and faith), thou hast verily no protector other than thyself in thy ills. The army of Sins and Sufferings is helpless so long as thou art devoted to Bodhi (2 114)

3 SAMSĀRĀNUPREKṢĀ

(Thoughts on the Cycle of Transmigration)

कर्मापित क्रमगति पुरुष शरीरमेक त्यजत्यपरमाभजते भवाद्बधौ ।

शैलूषयोषिदिव संसृतिरेनमेषा नाना विडम्बयति चित्रकरैः प्रपञ्चैः ॥

In the ocean of existence, the transmigrating soul leaves one body, the result of Karma, and resorts to another. The cycle of existence, like an actress, deludes the soul with many a marvellous show (2. 115).

देवाद्धनेष्वधिगतेषु पटुर्न काय काये पटौ न पुनरायुरवासवित्तम् ।

इत्य परस्परहतात्मभिरात्मधर्मैर्लोक सुदुःखयति जन्मकरः प्रबन्ध ॥

When by chance wealth is acquired, health is absent. When there is health, longevity attended by wealth is lacking. Thus the process of birth and rebirth inflicts misery on the world with its mutually contradictory attributes (2. 116)

आस्ता भवान्तरविधो सुविपर्ययोऽयमत्रैव जन्मनि नृणामधरोच्चभाव ।

अल्प पृथु पृथुरपि क्षणतोऽल्प एव स्वामी भवत्यनुचर स च तत्पदाहं ॥

Let alone the mighty ups and downs in the births to follow, even in this life men are subject to rise and fall. The small becomes great and in a moment the great becomes small. The master becomes servant and the latter attains the former's rank (2 117)

वैचित्र्यमित्यमनुभूय भवान्पुराशोरातङ्कवाडवविडम्बितजन्तुवारेः ।

को नाम जन्मविषयादपपुष्पकल्पैः स्व मोहयेन्मृगदृशां कृतधी कटाक्षैः ॥

Thus realising the varied moods of the ocean of existence, whose waters, to wit, the creatures, are oppressed by the submaïne fire of deadly disease, what wise man will let himself be bewitched by fair women's glances that seem to be the flowers of the poison tree of life ? (2 118)

4. EKATVĀNUPREKṢĀ

(Thoughts on one's Loneliness)

एकत्वमाविशसि जन्मनि संक्षये च भोक्तु स्वय स्वकृतकर्मफलानुबन्धम् ।

अन्यो न जातु सुखदुःखविधौ सहाय स्वाजीवनाय मिलित विटपेटक ते ॥

Thyself thou undergoest birth and death, all alone, to suffer the consequences of thy own deeds. Thou hast no companion in happiness or misery. Only a crowd of parasites gathers round thee to make thee living (2 119).

बाह्य परिग्रहविधिस्तत्र दूरमास्तां देहोऽयमेति न सम सहसंभवोऽपि ।

किं ताम्यसि त्वमनिशं क्षणदृष्टनष्टैर्दारात्मजद्विणमन्त्रिमोहपाशैः ॥

Let alone thy external possessions, even the body, coeval with thee, will not accompany thee at death. Why dost thou suffer evermore from such fetters of delusion as wife and children and wealth and home, appearing and disappearing in a moment? (2 120)

सशोच्य शोकविवशो दिवस तमेकमन्येधुरादरपरः स्वजनस्तवाथे ।

काथोऽपि भस्म भवति प्रचयाचिताशे संसारयन्त्रघटिकाघटने त्वमेक ॥

Whelmed with grief, thy relatives will mourn thy death only a day, but on the morrow they will be eager only for thy wealth, and the body will be reduced to ashes by the flames of the funeral pyre. Alone thou phiest the water-wheel of life! (2 121).

एष स्वयं तमचलैर्ननु कर्मजालैर्लतेव वेष्टयति नष्टमतिः स्वमेक ।

पुण्यात् पुनः प्रशमयन्तुकृतावलम्बस्तदाम धावति विधूतसमस्तशयम् ॥

Alone and enring, verily a sentient being is enmeshed, like a spider, in the rigid network of Karma, of his own free will. But by dint of religious merit he advances to that state of bliss, free from all pain, threading his way with the aid of spiritual calm (2. 122)

5 PṚTHAKTVĀNUPREKSĀ

(Thoughts on the Distinction between the Body and the Self)

देहात्मकोऽहमिति चेतसि मा कृथास्त्वत्त्वतो यतोऽस्य वपुषः परमो विवेकः ।

त्वं धर्मशर्मवसति परितोऽवसायः कायः पुनर्जडतया गतघ्नीलिकाय ॥

Never imagine that thou art composed of the body, because the body is utterly different from thee. Thou art all consciousness, an abode of virtue and bliss, whereas the body, because it is inert, is an unconscious mass (2 123).

आसीदिति त्वयि सति प्रतनोति कायः क्रान्ते तिरोभवति भूपवनादिरूपैः ।

भूतात्मकस्य मृतवन्न सुखादिभावस्तस्मात् कृती करणतः पृथगेव जीवः ॥

The body exists and grows so long as thou art in existence. When thou art dead, it disappears in the form of earth, air and the like. Composed of the elements, it is devoid of feelings such as joy, like a corpse. Hence the blissful self is surely different from the body (2 124)

सानन्दमव्ययमनादिमनस्तत्तुल्योत्तिष्ठति निरुपलेपरुणं प्रकृत्या ।

कृत्वा जडाश्रयमिमं पुरुषं समृद्धा सत्तापयन्ति रसवहुरिताग्नयोऽग्नी ॥

The Self is by nature deathless and without any beginning, endowed with bliss and infinite power, and luminous and pure. The powerful flames of sinful Karma heat it, like mercury, after lodging it in the body (2. 125)

कर्मासवानुभवनात् पुरुषः परोऽपि प्राप्नोति पातमशुभासु भवावनीषु ।
तस्मात्तयोः परमभेदविदो विदग्धाः श्रेयस्तदादधतु यत्र न जन्मयोगः ॥

Under the intoxicating power of Karma, even a man of superior merit goes reeling down to unhappy births. So let the wise, who know the cardinal difference between the body and the Self, strive for the bliss that is free from rebirth (2. 226).

6. ĀŚUCITVĀNUPREKṢĀ

(Thoughts on the Impurity of the Body)

आधीयते यदिह वस्तु गुणाय कान्त काये तदेव सुदुरेत्यपवित्रभावम् ॥
छायाप्रतारितमनिर्मलरन्ध्रबन्धं किं जीव लालयसि भङ्गुरमेतदङ्गम् ॥

Whatever is beautiful becomes unclean in a moment, when applied to the body to lend it charm. Deluded by the complexion, why dost thou, o soul, cherish this perishable frame, beset with cavities of dirt? (2. 127).

योषिद्गिरादतकरं कृतमण्डनश्रीर्यं कामचामररुचिस्तव केशपाशः ।
सोऽयं त्वयि श्रवणगोचरतां प्रयाते प्रेतावनीषु वनवायसवासगोऽभूत् ॥

This thy lock of hair, beautiful as the fly-whisk of the god of love, and elegantly dressed by ladies with careful hands, will, on thy death, find itself in the haunt of wild ravens on cremation-grounds! (2. 128).

अन्तर्बहिर्हृदि भवेद्गुणः शरीरं दैवात्तदा अनुभवं ननु दूरमास्ताम् ।
कौतूहलादपि यदीक्षितुमुत्सहेतुं कुर्यात्तदाभिरतिमत्र भवाञ्शरीरे ॥

If by any chance the interior of the body were visible outside, and thou couldst bring thyself to look at it even out of curiosity, contact being out of the question, then thou wouldst indeed delight in the body! (2. 123).

तस्मान्निसर्गमलिनादपि लब्धतत्त्वा कीनाशकेलिमनवासधियोऽचिराय ।
कायादतः किमपि तत् फलमर्जयन्तु यस्मादनन्तसुखसखविभूतिरेषा ॥

So let men, having learnt the truth even from the body, unclean by nature, and without taking thought of death, attain before long that inexpressible goal which yields a rich harvest of infinite joy! (2. 130).

7. ĀSRĀVĀNUPREKṢĀ

(Thoughts on the Influx of Karma)

अन्तः कषायकलुषोऽशुभयोगसंगात् कर्माण्युपार्जयसि बन्धनिबन्धनानि ।
रज्जुः करेणुवशागः करटी यथैतास्त्वं जीव मुञ्च तदिमानि दुरीहितानि ॥

With thy heart contaminated by passions, thou dost acquire Karma, the cause of bondage, owing to thy assiduity in evil activities, just as an elephant forgetting himself in the company of his mate, earns for himself the ropes that bind him. Renounce, therefore, o sentient being, all thy misdeeds (2. 131).

संकल्पकल्पतरुसंश्रयणात्त्वदीय चेतो निमज्जति मनोरथसागरेऽस्मिन् ।

तत्रार्थतस्तव चकास्ति न किञ्चनापि पक्षे पर भवसि कदमषसंश्रयस्य ॥

Thy heart is submerged in the ocean of desire, because it clings to the all-giving tree of imagination. Thou dost thereby gain really nothing, but only followest the path to sin (2 132).

सैर्ग्यं विभूतिषु मनोषितसंश्रयाणां चक्षुर्भवत्तव निजातिषु मोघवान्धम् ।

पापागमाय परमेव भवेद्विमूढ कामात् कुत सुकृतदूरवर्ता हितानि ॥

Thy mind, o fool, absorbed in its hankerings and frustrated in its desires, jealously contemplates the splendour of the objects of desire, but only paves the way to sin. How can those who are remote from virtue acquire joys by merely yearning for them? (2 133).

दौर्विध्यदग्धमनसोऽन्तरुपात्तभुक्तेश्चित्तं यथोल्लसति ते स्फुरितोत्तरङ्गम् ।

धास्ति स्फुरेद्यदि तथा परमात्मसंज्ञे कौतस्कुती तव भवेद्विफला प्रसूतिः ॥

Thy birth would never be futile, if thy heart delighted in the Light called the Supreme Self,¹ in the same way as it cheers up, heaving with the waves of desire, when thou thinkest of imaginary pleasures, thy mind consumed by penury (2. 134).

8. SAMVARĀNUPREKSĀ

(Thoughts on the Stoppage of the Influx of Karma)

आगच्छतोऽभिनवकर्मणरेणुराशेर्जीवः करोति यदवस्त्रलन वितन्द* ।

सत्तत्त्वचामरधरैः प्रणिधानहस्तैः सन्तो विदुस्तमिह सवरमात्मनीनम् ॥

The watchful Soul stops the oncoming dust of ever-new Karmas, with the helping hand of meditation, upholding the banner of right doctrines. The good in the world call this samvara (stoppage) that benefits the soul (2 135).

नीरन्ध्रसंधिरवचीरितनीरपूरः पोतः सरित्पतिमपैति यथानपाय ।

जीवस्तथा क्षपितपूर्वतम प्रतान क्षीणास्त्रवश्च परमं पदमाश्रयेत् ॥

Like as a boat without holes and joints safely traverses the ocean, defying the surge of waters, similarly, the soul, with the expanse of earlier Karma destroyed, and the influx of new ones stopped, reaches the Supreme Goal (2 137).

9. LOKĀNUPREKSĀ

(Thoughts on the Universe)

मध्याधरोर्ध्वरचनं पवनत्रयान्तस्तुल्यं स्थितेन जघनस्थकरेण पुसा ।

एकस्थितिस्तव निकेतनमेष लोकस्त्रयन्निकीर्णजठरोऽग्रनिषण्णमोक्ष ॥

Composed of the upper, the middle and the lower regions, and bounded by

1 For the Jaina idea of the paramātman see Chap. X.

the three atmospheres¹, and surmounted by the abode of liberated souls, the universe resembles a man in standing posture (with outstretched legs), with the hands resting on the hips. Ever in the same position, it is thy abode, its womb filled with living creatures² (2 138)

स्व कल्मषावृतमतिनिरये तिरश्चि पुण्योचितो दिवि नृपु द्वयकर्मयोगात् ।

इत्थ निधीदसि जगत्त्रयमन्दिरेऽस्मिन् स्वैर प्रचारविधये तव लोके एष ॥

When thy mind is beset with sin, thou art born in hell, or as some lower animal. Thou art born in heaven, when thou hast religious merit, and among mankind as a result of virtue and sin. Thus thou livest in the three worlds. The universe exists for thy wanderings at will (2 140)

अत्रास्ति जीव न च किंचिदभुक्तमुक्त स्थान त्वया निखिलतः परिशीलनेन ।

तत् केवलं विगलिताखिलकर्मजालं स्पृष्टं कुतूहलधियापि न जातु धाम ॥

No place is there in the entire universe, o soul, which thou hast not repeatedly enjoyed and left³. But not even out of curiosity hast thou ever approached the place whence all Karma is banished (2 141)

10 NIRJARĀNUPREKSĀ

(Thoughts on the Shedding of Karma)

आपातरभ्यरचनैर्विरसावसानैर्जन्मोद्भवै सुखलवै स्वलितान्तरङ्ग ।

दु खानुषङ्गकरमज्जितवान् यदेनस्तत्त्व सहस्र हतजीव नवप्रयातम् ॥

Suffer, o miserable being, the consequences of the pain-bringing, ever-new sins thou hast committed, led astray by the pleasures of life, charming in the beginning and unpleasant at the end (2 142).

कालुष्यमेपि यदिह स्वयमात्मकामो जागर्ति तत्र ननु कर्म पुरातनं ते ।

योऽर्हि विवर्धयति कोऽपि विमुग्धबुद्धिः स्वसोदयाय स नरः प्रवर कथं स्यात् ॥

Verily it is due to thy ancient Karma that thou, with desire inbred in thee, makest thyself impure in this life. How can the fool that nourishes a serpent achieve his own success? (2 143)

आतङ्कपावकशिखाः सरसावलेखा स्वस्थे मनाञ्जनसि ते लघु विस्मरन्ति ।

तत्कालजातमतिविस्फुरितानि पञ्चाजीवान्यथा यदि भवन्ति कुतोऽप्रिय ते ॥

Thou sentient being, when thy mind is a little at ease, the keenly felt flames of suffering are quickly forgotten. But if the resolve (to practise virtue), taken at the moment of suffering, is subsequently kept in mind, how can sorrow ever be thine? (2 144)

1 वनवात (gross air), अम्युवात (vapour), and तनुवात (thin air) See Uttarvārthasūtra 3 1 and Pūjyapāda's comm thereon. Also Jaini's trans and notes

2 Śubhacandra gives another picture of the universe according to the Jain conception in his Jñānārṇava (Lokabhāvanā) वेष्टितं पवनैः प्रान्ते महावेगेनैहावलैः । त्रिभिस्त्रिमुवनाकीर्णो लोकः स्तालतरस्सिति ॥ × × अथो वेत्रासनाकारो मध्ये स्याद्बह्वरीनिभः ॥ वृद्धसदृशश्चाग्रे स्यादित्य स त्रयात्मकः ॥

3 i. e. in the course of transmigration.

11. DHARMĀNUPREKṢĀ

(Thoughts on Dharma or Religious Virtue)

अद्वाभिसंधिरवधूतबहि समीहस्तत्त्वावसायसलिलाहितमूलबन्धः ।

आत्मायमात्मनि तनोति फलद्वयार्थं धर्मं तमादुरमृतोपमसस्यमाप्ता ॥

Intent on faith, and discarding external activities, the Self, desirous of the twin results, heaven and salvation, cultivates within itself Dharma (Religious Virtue), laying its foundation with the water of the knowledge of the fundamental principles. The wise call Dharma a plant with the properties of nectar (2. 145)

मैत्रीदयादमशमागमनिर्वृतानां बाह्येन्द्रियप्रसरवर्जितमानसानाम् ।

विद्याप्रभाप्रहतमोहमहाप्रहाणा धर्मं परापरफलं सुलभो नराणाम् ॥

Religious virtue, productive of salvation as well as worldly joys, can easily be attained by men who delight in the exercise of good will, kindness, self-control and forbearance, whose minds are free from sensual cravings, and who have destroyed the spectre of ignorance with the light of knowledge (2. 146)

इच्छाः फलैः कलयति प्ररुणद्धि बाधाः सृष्टेरसाम्यविभुरभ्युदयादिभिर्यः ।

ज्योतींषि दूतयति चात्मसमीहितेषु धर्मैः स शर्मनिधिरस्तु सतां हिताय ॥

A treasure-house of bliss, may Dharma confer benefit on the good ! It crowns one's desires with success and wards off all evils and wields unrivalled power over the creation by reason of its vouchsafing prosperity and other results. It sends forth the Lights of supersensuous knowledge as messengers to evoke the aspirations of the Self ! (2. 147)

देहोपहारकुतपै स्वपरोपतापैः कृत्वाध्वरेश्वरमिषं विदुलन्मनीषाः ।

धर्मैषिणो य इह केचन मान्द्यभाजस्ते जातजीवितधियो विषमापिबन्ति ॥

Unintelligent men, who desire to attain Dharma, by worshipping Śiva with vociferous texts,¹ recommending animal sacrifices and causing suffering to their own followers and others, are fools that take poison with the idea of preserving their lives (2. 148)

येऽन्यत्र मन्त्रमहिमेक्षणसुरधबोधाः शर्वैषिणः पुनरतः श्रिवतां गृणन्ति ।

ते नापि तारणदृशो दृषदोऽवलम्ब्य दुष्पारमग्नुभिजलं परिलङ्घयन्ति ॥

Those of other faiths, who are befooled by the sight of the efficacy of mystic formulas, and adore Śiva and declare salvation to be his gift, are men who seek to traverse the impassable waters of the ocean by supporting themselves on blocks of stone, fancying that they are crossing by boats (2. 149)

1 Śrutasaṅgāra says in his commentary कुतपस्त्यामि वेदवचनानि इत्यर्थस्तैः

अज्ञस्य शक्तिरसमर्थविधेर्निबोधस्तौ चारुचेरियममू तुदती न किञ्चित् ।
अन्धाद्विहीनहतवाञ्छितमानसानां दृष्टा न जातु हितवृत्तिरनन्तराया ॥

The strength of one who lacks knowledge and the knowledge of one who is unable to act as well as the strength and knowledge of one who has no faith accomplish nothing, because the lack of faith renders knowledge and strength futile. The salutary endeavour of the blind or the lame or those who have lost all hope hath never been seen to be free from obstacles (2. 151.)

चार्या रूचौ तदुचिताचरणे च नृणां दृष्टार्थसिद्धिरगदादिनिषेवणेषु ।
तस्मात् परापरफलप्रदधर्मकामा. सन्तस्त्रयावगमनीतिपरा भवन्तु ॥

Men are seen to attain their object in acts like the taking of medicine for health, when they have right knowledge and faith and observe the right procedure. So let the good, who aspire after Dharma that gives worldly happiness and final release, devote themselves to the way of realising the triad of right knowledge, conduct and faith (2. 152).

12 BODHYANUPREKSĀ

(Thoughts on Bodhi or the Acquisition of Three Jewels)

संसारसागरमिम भ्रमता नितान्त जीवेन मानवभवः समवापि देवात् ।
तत्रापि यद्भुवनमान्यकुले प्रसूति. सत्संगतिश्च तदिहान्धकवर्तकीयम् ॥

Unceasingly wandering on the ocean of transmigration, a sentient creature is born as a human being by chance. Even then birth in a family respected by the world and association with the good are as rare as the coming of a quail within a blind man's grasp (2. 153).

कृच्छ्राद्भनस्पतिगतेश्च्युत एष जीव श्रेष्ठेषु कलमवशेन पुनः प्रयाति ।
तेभ्य. परस्परविरोधिभ्युगप्रसूतावस्थाः पञ्चप्रतिनिभेषु कुमानवेषु ॥

Released from birth in the plant world, after much suffering, a sentient being is again born in the hells on account of his sins, then in the genus of animals, mutually hostile, and then again among uncouth men resembling animals (2. 154)

संसारयन्त्रमुदयास्तघटीपरीतं सातानतामसगुणं श्रुतमाश्रितोद्यै ।
इत्थ चतुर्गत्तिसरित्परिवर्तमध्यमावाहयेत् स्वकृतकर्मफलानि भोक्तुम् ॥

Thus, in order to reap the consequences of one's deeds, one has to ply the water-wheel of transmigration, bounded by the vessels of prosperity and adversity, and overflowing with the waters of suffering, and furnished with the expansive cords of sin, with the hub of the wheel rotating in the river of the four conditions of existence¹ (2. 155).

May Bodhi (the acquisition of the Three Jewels¹) lead the man with faith to that exalted state, namely, Liberation, the man that is averse to worldly phenomena and eager for spiritual calm, self-controlled, and kind to all creatures, and fond of the truth, his heart devoted to the Inner Self! (2. 157)

THE HYMNS

The next category of Jaina religious poetry, the hymns, as far as they are represented in Yasastilaka, consist mostly of verses in praise of the Arhat, the five Paṇamesthins (Arhat, Siddha, Ācārya, Upādhyāya and Sādhu), and the three Jewels (Right Faith, Right Knowledge and Right Conduct). Most of these verses occur in Book VIII, section 35, while another series of verses accompanying various items in the worship of Jina is found in Section 36. Section 37 of the same Book contains a long hymn in honour of Jina in the lyrical metres described in Chap. VII. Reference may also be made to the dhyāna (hymn for mental recitation in the course of meditation) in section 39, extracts from which will be found in Chap. X. Verses in honour of the Jaina Sarasvatī, the presiding goddess of the Scriptures, occur in Section 40, which deals with her worship.² While most of these eulogistic and devotional verses occur in connection with Sāmāyika or the customary worship of Jina described in Book VIII, isolated verses in his honour are also found elsewhere in the work usually at the beginning and the end of a chapter.

The verses which we have called hymns are composed in elaborate metres in elevated style, as may be expected in a Kāvya poet like the author of Yasastilaka. They are in the nature of a tribute to moral, intellectual and spiritual grandeur, and glorify the sublime in the sphere of religion, asceticism and spiritual culture. The ideal of omniscient and immaculate sainthood, the utter disregard of the body and worldly aspirations, self-control, altruism and universal good-will, right knowledge and faith and conduct—these form the keynote of the eulogies, the abstract character of which may be contrasted with the concrete descriptions of many Brahmanical hymns. At the same time the sectarian character of some of the verses is all too apparent, as their purpose is to glorify Jaina dogmas and tenets, specially the Syādvāda doctrine. Nevertheless, these little hymns or prayers breathe an atmosphere of saintly purity, and proclaim the triumph of Light over Darkness, of the all-pure Self over the obstacles of matter.

The scheme of arrangement of the devotional verses in Book VIII, sections 35-37, is worthy of notice. Somadeva starts with elaborate and complicated prose invocations of the five Paramesthins and the three Jewels,¹ followed by groups of verses styled Bhaktis in the following order: Darśanabhakti (Addressed to Jina), Praise of Right Faith (three verses); Jñānabhakti, Praise of Right Knowledge (three verses), Cāritrabhakti, Praise of Right Conduct (three verses), Arhadbhakti, Praise of the Arhat (seven verses); Siddhabhakti, Praise of the emancipated saints (three verses), Caityabhakti, Praise of the Shrine (one verse), Pañcagurubhakti, Praise of the five teachers, that is, the Paramesthins (one verse), Śāntibhakti, Praise of the Tirthamkara Śāntinātha (one verse), and Ācāryabhakti, Praise of the Preceptor Saints (ten verses). It may be noted in this connection that the use of the term Bhakti in the sense of 'a devotional prayer or hymn' is much earlier than Somadeva, who was no doubt influenced to some extent by the Bhaktis attributed to Pūjyapāda and Kundakunda.² The Bhaktis in our work are followed by a description of the ceremonial worship of Jina, dealt with in Book VIII, Section 36, which contains the devotional verses (including a prose passage) recited in the various stages of the ritual. This is followed by the lyrical hymn in Section 37, which is meant to be sung after the formal worship is over. Somadeva's arrangement of the verses is designed to conform to ceremonial requirements, but their independent value as notable specimens of Jaina religious poetry can be easily recognised. The following specimens are mainly from the verses classified above.

It contains Siddhabhakti, Śrutabhakti, Cāritrabhakti, Yogibhakti, Ācāryabhakti, Pañcagurubhakti etc in Sanskrit and Prākṛit. The work is anonymous, but Prabhācandra remarks at the end of the comm on Siddhabhakti that the Sanskrit Bhaktis were composed by Pūjyapāda and the Prākṛit ones by Kundakunda.

Verses in honour of the Śrutadevatā, the presiding goddess of sacred lore, the Jaina Sarasvatī, occur in connection with her worship, which is described immediately after the discourse on meditation (dhyanavādhī)¹ One of these verses is cited below

Early youth, charming young women, beautiful mansions and salutary wealth : these are the fruits of the tree of life. That there is heaven other than these is definitely untrue. But they have one defect. No means is there in the world to ensure their permanence. If that were possible, the assiduity in religious austerities of those who are conversant with the truth would merely amount to exhaustion of the body. A child is not fit for austerities owing to his ignorance, and a youth is liable to penalty if he should undertake them, while a middle-aged man is responsible for the support of his family, and an old man just manages to subsist. Under the influence of others, a sentient being, although he knows the truth, has his mind in the grip of the demon of false belief, and is dragged along by the messengers of Fate for undergoing the cycle of births (Book IV, P. 94).

Even an insignificant desire for the acquisition of religious merit destroys an enormous quantity of sins. Does not the sun, though limited in extent, destroy the darkness reigning in all the three worlds? (Book V)

CHAPTER XII

A CONTROVERSIAL DIALOGUE

One of the most interesting episodes of Yasastilaka is the animated dialogue in Book IV between Yasodhara and his mother Candramati on the subject of animal sacrifice, the former being a convert to Jainism, and the latter a champion of the Brahmanical faith. Certain tenets of the Vedic religion are attacked by Yaśodhara in the course of his argument, and he also attempts to establish the ancient and authoritative character of the Jaina faith by citing various texts from what are apparently non-Jaina sources. A dramatic character is given to the dialogue by the use of parenthetical indications resembling stage directions, and but for the numerous quotations, the dialogue is cast in a form that could easily be adapted to the stage. Another, and perhaps more striking, example of a dramatic dialogue occurs in our work in the story of Padmā in Book VII.¹

The controversy between Yaśodhara and his mother starts from the point where the latter asks him to sacrifice all kinds of animals before the tutelary goddess, and then perform an appropriate rite to counteract the effect of his evil dream. While making the request, she asserts on the authority of Manu that animals may be legitimately killed in sacrifices and the worship of the gods and the Manes, and, as a matter of fact, a Brāhmaṇa, killing animals on such occasions, ensures for himself as well as the victims a state of bliss after death. Further, the killing of animals in sacrifices is not killing at all, since animals have been created by Brahman himself for the purpose of sacrifices, and sacrifices are meant for the good of all.

Yaśodhara, closing his ears and heaving a sigh, expresses surprise at the amount of evil that can be done by delusion and its cause ignorance, and entreats his mother to allow him to speak a few words. After a preliminary discussion on Cārvāka views, which mother and son agree in repudiating, Yaśodhara admits the desirability of a rite for counteracting the effect of an evil dream, but firmly objects to the expedient of sacrificing animals before the goddess, as suggested by his mother. The protection of living creatures, he argues, is the primary duty of Kṣatriyas, and it would be a repudiation of that duty if he killed harmless animals. A king, in fact, takes up arms only against an armed foe on the battlefield or a malefactor of his kingdom, but never against those who are wretched or lowly or well-meaning. 'How then, mother', asks Yaśodhara, 'can I strike living creatures with weapons, myself pure in my conduct in relation to this life and the life beyond?' Further, has she forgotten that only the previous day the minister's son Nītibīhaspati had, at her instance, taught him certain significant verses on the subject?

न कुर्वीति स्वयं हिंसा प्रवृत्तां च निवारयेत् । जीवितं बलमारोग्यं शश्वद्वाञ्छन् महीपति ॥

यो दद्यात् काञ्चन मेरुं कृत्स्नां चापि वसुंधराम् । एकस्य जीवितं दद्यात् फलेन न समं भवेत् ॥

यथात्मनि शरीरस्य दुःखं नेच्छन्ति जन्तवः । तथा यदि परस्यापि न दुःखं तेषु जायते ॥

‘A king who constantly desires longevity, strength and health must do no injury to living creatures himself nor allow it to take place when planned by others. One may give away the Meru mountain of gold as well as the entire earth. The result will not be equal to that of saving the life of a single sentient being. Suffering will cease to exist among living creatures if they no longer wish to cause physical pain to others, just as they do not wish to cause it to themselves.’

Yasodhara points out that there are many commendable expedients other than the killing of animals for propitiating the Brāhmanas and the gods, and sustaining the body. Why do honest people then commit the sin of killing? Besides, animal flesh is full of impurities if it pleased the gods, we would rather worship the tigers!

सत्तर्पणार्थं द्विजदेवतानां पुष्ट्यर्थमङ्गस्य च सन्त्युपाया ।

अन्येऽपि लोके बहवः प्रशस्ताः सन्तः कुतः पापमिहाचरन्ति ॥

शुक्रशोणितसभूतमशुचीनां निकेतनम् । मांसं चेत् श्रीणयेद्देवानेतद्भ्याम्रात्रुपासहे ॥

Yasodhara declares the current opinion that the gods are pleased with animal sacrifices to be false, and says

हताः कृपाणेन वनेऽपि जन्तवो बाढं म्रियन्ते गलपीडनाच्च ।

अदन्ति चैतान् स्वयमेव देव्यो व्याघ्रा स्तवार्हाः परमत्र सन्तु ॥

कृत्वा मिषं दैवमयं हि लोको मद्ये च मासे च रतिं करोति ।

एव न चेद्दुर्गतिर्लोकस्य स्याद्दुष्कर्मणां कोऽपर एव मार्गः ॥

‘Animals surely perish in the woods, killed with swords, or strangled to death, and there are goddesses who of their own accord devour them. But the tigers alone are worthy of praise (for they themselves kill and eat unlike the gods who make others kill). People are addicted to wine and flesh on the pretext that these serve to please the gods. But if the wicked do not go to hell in this way, what other way thitherward is open to them?’ Further, if Dharma is really based on the killing of animals, why is hunting called pāpāṇḍhā, ‘progress in sin’? Why is it customary to bring in flesh under cover? Why is flesh called Rāvanasāka, ‘Ravana’s herb’? Why is it shunned on sacred days? Yasodhara terminates this part of his argument by quoting a number of authoritative texts in support of abstention from killing.

Hearing these words, Yaśodhara's mother says to herself:

माता—(स्वगतम्) अहो मदीये सुते साप्रत जैनजनवात इव लग्न प्रतिभासते । विषमश्च खलु भवत्ययं जन । यस्माच्चिरं समयान्तरोपरचितप्रतीकाराण्यप्यन्येषा मनासि प्रायेण पश्यतोहर इव हरत्यार्हतो लोक । तद्वासनावासितं हि चेतो न ब्रह्मणापि शक्यतेऽन्यथाकर्तुम् । दुश्चिकित्सश्च खलु करिणा कूटपाकल इव प्राणिनां क्षपणकोपनोत्थितस्याभिनिवेश ।

'Ah, now the Jaina wind seems to have taken possession of my son. These Jainas are difficult people to deal with, because like thieves, they beguile the minds of men, though long protected by the doctrines of other schools. Once the mind is imbued with their ideas, Brahman himself cannot divert it to other channels. The cast of mind produced in men by the Jainas is indeed beyond remedy, like the fever of elephants.' Candiamati then recollects the priest's son Śivaśarman having told her that the king had met a Digambara Jaina ascetic living under a tree, and for a long while discussed religious topics with him. She remarks that her son has since evinced a dislike for wine, meat, hunting and animal sacrifice, and demonstrated his hostility to the injunctions of the Vedas and the Law-books.

Then addressing herself to the councillors, and calling them monsters and destroyers of her son and the kingdom, and despoilers of the people, she gives vent to her wrath and censures them for allowing her immature son, despite her instructions to the contrary, to come into touch with the Digambara Jainas, who are, like magicians, habitually skilled in bewitching the world. She addresses her son in a menacing tone, and calling him a raw Cārvāka, tells him that she has understood him well, and can herself give him a suitable reply. She asks him how he can ever have any leaning towards the religion of the Digambaras, which makes no provision for the gratification of the gods, the Manes and the Brāhmanas, and for dips in sacred waters as well as oblations in the fire; a religion outside the jurisdiction of the Vedas and the Law-books. None but him would care to talk with those heretics, who speak ill of the gods and the Brāhmanas, eat standing like brutes, and are devoid of all sense of shame and personal hygiene. Besides, their system came into being only in the Kali Age, and not even their name was known in earlier times. They hold quite unreasonably that men become gods and the gods are many.¹ To speak the truth, the Veda is the sole authority in the matter of religion, and there is no god other than the Veda. He who does not know the Veda well does not know the regulations of the four castes and the four stages of life. Then if Yaśodhara has any devotion

1 The reference is to the twenty four Tirthankaras or Apostles worshipped as divine beings to the gods, let him worship Śiva or Visnu or the Sun. When they are pleased, they transport their worshippers in a moment to their respective cities, and when gratified, vouchsafe even a kingdom

 नयन्ति हृष्टाः स्वपुरीं क्षणेन तुष्टाः प्रयच्छन्ति च राज्यमेते ॥

Hearing these words, Yaśodhara reflects within himself that even washing with nectar cannot cleanse a heart that is by nature black as charcoal. Yet he recognises that his opponent in the debate is his own mother, 'the presiding deity of the kingdom', and she is at liberty to speak as she likes to him. Then addressing his mother and entreating her to pardon him for what he is going to say, he replies to the charges brought by her against the Jaina religion, and in so doing severely criticizes certain aspects of the Brahmanical faith

Speaking of Śrāddha, Yaśodhara argues that if it is true that the Pitris have betaken themselves to earthly existences or celestial abodes as a result of their good deeds, they cannot have any need for annual offerings of rice-balls, which are actually taken by Brāhmanas and crows

मर्त्येषु चेत् सद्यसु नाकिनां वा विधाय पुण्यं पितरः प्रयाताः ।
 तेषामपेक्षा द्विजकाकभुक्तैः पिण्डैर्भवेद्द्वर्षकृतैर्न कापि ॥

Further, the ancients prescribed Śrāddha and other rites by way of religious observances, because religion has to be practised by all decent people, desirous of their own good, in one form or another, and no one, as a rule, practises religion unless there is an occasion for it

येनापि केनापि मिषेण मान्यैर्धर्मो विधेयः स्वहितैकतान्यैः ।

निर्विमिश्रं न कोऽपीह जनः प्रायेण धर्मधीः । अतः श्रद्धादिकाः प्रोक्ताः क्रियाः कुशलबुद्धिभिः ॥

Similarly, the observance of Amāvāsyā, pilgrimage, reception of guests, Śrāddha rites, and observances connected with particular days, occasions and stars have been declared by the ancients to be conducive to the religious merit of those who are unable to practise constant charity

पर्वतीर्थातिथिश्राद्धवारवासरतारकाः । नित्यं दातुमशक्तानां पुण्यायोक्ताः पुरातनैः ॥

It is not true to say that the Jainas do not gratify the Twice-born. They do worship the Munis (Jaina ascetics), who are 'Twice-born', being once actually born, and born a second time at the time of initiation into the religious vows. Nor is it true to say that Jainism does not recognise ceremonial baths, because the Jaina householder is enjoined to take a bath before worshipping the Aihat or studying the Sacred Books or devoting himself to meditation. One must not, however, think that a mere dip in a river or a pool of water or a tank or the ocean leads to any religious merit, for in that case it is the aquatic animals that would go to heaven first. It has been rightly said that those who are maddened by passion, hate and pride, and addicted to women, are never purified even by bathing at hundreds of sacred sites

तदाह—रागद्वेषमदोन्मत्ताः स्त्रीणां ये वशवर्तिनः । न ते कालेन शुद्ध्यन्ति स्नानात्तीर्थशतैरपि ॥

As regards Homa, it is impossible that the gods who feed on nectar and live in luxury in heaven should ever partake of oblations made in the fire. The expression agnimukhāh, as applied to the gods, means 'those who have faces bright as fire', just as candramukhī kanyā means 'a moon-faced girl', but it does not mean, as is usually supposed, 'those who have Fire for mouth'.

Yasodhara then refutes the charge that Jainism is a modern creed unknown to the Vedas and the Law Books, by citing a number of texts supposed to contain references to Jaina ascetics, images and doctrines.¹ It is, accordingly, concluded that just as there are four oceans and six seasons, similarly there are four schools of thought and six systems of philosophy including, of course, the system of the Jainas.²

Yasodhara emphasizes the purity of the Jaina religion

वदन्ति जैनास्तमिहासमेते रागादयो यत्र न सन्ति दोषाः ।
मद्यादिशब्दोऽपि च यत्र दुष्टः शिष्टैः स निन्द्येत कथं नु धर्मः ॥

‘The Jainas call him an Āpta who is free from passion and such other blemishes How can the cultured censure a religion wherein even terms like wine are condemned’² The Āihat, free from passion, is contrasted with a Brahmanical god The latter is blind with rage in dealing with enemies, and loves his wives if such an individual is a god, the universe is full of gods

परेषु योगेषु मनीषयान्धः प्रीतिं दधाल्यात्मपरिग्रहेषु ।
तथापि देव स यदि प्रसक्तमेतज्जगद्देवमय समस्तम् ॥

Yasodhara then condemns the use of wine, flesh and honey, and recounts the evil consequences of drinking

लज्जा न सज्जा कुशलं न शीलं श्रुतं न वृतं न वरः प्रचारः ।
मयेन मन्दीकृतमानसानां विवेकनाशाच्च पिशाचभावः ॥

‘Those who are stupefied with drink have no sense of shame nor propriety of conduct nor knowledge of sacred lore nor commendable activities, they are as ghosts owing to the loss of the power of discernment’

The authority of the Veda is next attacked The speaker contends that the injunctions of the Veda are guided by the instincts of the crowd, and often self-contradictory No sure clue is to be found in the Veda as to what is to be done and what avoided, and the Veda can in no sense be an authority for the world.

यथाजनाकृतमयं प्रवृत्तः परस्परार्थप्रतिकूलवृत्तः ।

विधौ निषेधे च न निश्चयोऽस्ति कथं स वेदो जगतः प्रमाणम् ॥

An instance of how the Veda follows the instincts of the crowd is found in the fact that the common people desire to take meat, and the Veda sanctions meat-eating by prescribing certain rules for it, e. g., meat is to be taken after ceremonially sprinkling it with water in accordance with the desire of the Brāhmanas, and it is also permissible to take it after worshipping the Manes and the gods.¹ Similarly, the Veda legitimizes the lewd desires of certain people by sanctioning incest in the Gosava

1 तथा हि मास चेदाचरितुमिच्छसि आचर । किं तु विधिपूर्वकमाचरितव्यम् । तदाह—प्रोक्षितं भक्षयेन्मासं ब्राह्मणानां तु काम्यया । अर्चयित्वा पितृन् देवान् खादन् मासं न दुष्यति ॥

sacrifice¹, and there are also other instances in which the injunctions of the Veda follow the inclinations of the populace² This explains the universal popularity of the Veda, for no one who obeys the desires of the people is ever disliked But men by nature lack the power of discrimination, and covet one another's wives and wealth, and what are we to think of a Scripture that sets itself to conform to their wishes?

प्रसिद्धिरत एवास्य सर्वसाधारणी मता । को हि नाम भवेद् द्वेष्यो लोकच्छन्दानुवर्तन ॥

हिताहितावेदि जगन्निसर्गत परस्परस्त्रीधनलोलमानसम् ।

तत्रापि यद्यागम एष तन्मनोवशेन वर्तेत तदा किमुच्यते ॥

Instances of self-contradiction are found in the Veda There is a Vedic injunction against the drinking of wine and the killing of a Brāhmana, but wine is nevertheless prescribed in the Sautrāmanī sacrifice, and a Brāhmana may be sacrificed to Brahman³ Similarly, the Veda, after prohibiting a Brāhmana from serving a Śūdra or accepting food on the means of livelihood from him, asks the former to accept for sacrificial purposes the flesh of animals killed by Cāndālas, dogs, tigers and others.⁴ Even in worldly affairs a person who is consistent in what he says is alone trusted, and who can have any respect for a scripture containing such conflicting statements?

प्रमाणं व्यवहारेऽपि जन्तुरेकस्थितिर्मतः । को नामेत्य विरुद्धार्थे सादरो निगमे नर ॥

Yasodhara points out that independent discussion of the injunctions of the Veda, just as one discusses the scriptures composed by a known author, is held to be a great sin⁵ But he asserts that it is absurd to say that a man is liable to sin as great as that of killing a Brāhmana if he questions the authority of the statements of Manu, Vyāsa and Vasistha, based on the Veda⁶

Yasodhara ridicules the suggestion that he should worship Śiva or Viṣṇu or the Sun

'It is strange that the Sun should be able to exterminate the suffering of others caused by disease, himself stricken with leprosy in the feet' (On the same principle) a she-goat, who (with her flesh) cures the gout of others, would herself die of gout''

Speaking of the Aihats, the omniscient world-teachers worshipped by the Jainas as divine beings, Yaśodhara explains that the virtues of the Aihat are known from the Scripture composed by himself.¹ The chain of emancipated Aihats and Scriptures is without beginning or end, like the cycle of creation, existence and destruction, or that of the seasons winter, summer and the rains. Further, it is not absurd to hold that just as there are past, present and future kings, conversant with the three worlds, similarly there are present and future Āptas or Arhats, and plurality of this sort is surely found also in other faiths.

Yaśodhara's mother, on hearing these words, says to herself that the time is gone when her son could be compelled to carry out her wishes by argument or threat or even a box in the ear. Addressing herself to her son, she extols his wisdom and learning, and appeals to him again to offer animal sacrifices to the tutelary goddess for counteracting the effect of the evil dream and preserving his own life. After citing some instances of sages and others who are known to have killed various living creatures for their own good,² she asserts that a king, pure in his motives, can never incur any sin, just as lotus leaves cannot be drenched with water or the sky bedaubed with mud. She then declares thus

विषं विषस्यौषधमक्षिरग्नेरियं प्रसिद्धिर्मेहती यथैव ।

2 See Chapter XVII

'It is very wellknown that poison is the remedy for poison, and fire for fire. On similar grounds, even destruction of life may lead to religious merit. The number of ploughs is not six on every plot, my child.'¹

Further, a person in the habit of probing a matter too much with minute investigation gains thereby nothing, and it is advisable to do as the world does, since the path followed by the many is the true path

न कापि पुंसः पुरुषार्थसिद्धिः सूक्ष्मेक्षयातीवपरीक्षकस्य ।

Candramati goes on to praise the joys of wine and flesh-eating

'What wise man would attempt to give up wine, the mirror of the graceful gestures of fair women, wine that excites love and removes fatigue? Women who abstain from wine are as good as dead in the opinion of adepts in erotic love. And those who eat without the flavour of meat verily eat with that of dung.'

Yasodhara's mother concludes her appeal by citing a number of Smṛti verses on the subject of meat offerings to the Manes. But the son remains unconvinced, and after a brief soliloquy makes his final declaration on the points at issue

रजस्तमोभ्यां बहुलस्य पुंसः पापं सतां नैव निदर्शनाय ।

यथा मम प्राणवधे भवत्या महान्ति दुःखानि भवन्ति मातः ।

तथा परेषामपि जीवहानौ भवन्ति दुःखानि तदम्बिकानाम् ॥

'The sin committed by a man overpowered by evil propensities and delusion is no example for the good² nor does supervening sin, like dust, make any distinction of family or caste. Birth, old age and death and disease and the like are common to kings and others. But kings are superior to other men in religious merit, no difference exists so far as the human aspect is concerned³. Mother, just as thou wouldst feel profound sorrow if I were killed, similarly the mothers of others would be aggrieved if their sons were to lose their lives'

1 The speaker means to say that there is no hard and fast rule that ahimsā in every case will lead to sin

2 The reference is to the sin of men like Gautama and Viśvāmitra who are said to have killed living creatures for preserving their own lives

3 Yaśodhara refers to the religious responsibility of kings, which makes them uphold the principle of ahimsā.

Further, if it had been possible to save one's own life by taking the life of another, the kings of old would never have died, and if the sāstric injunction sanctioning flesh-eating were to be applied universally, one would have to eat even the flesh of dogs and crows !

परस्य जीवेन यदि स्वरक्षा पूर्वे क्षितीयाः कुत एव मम ।

शास्त्र तु सर्वत्र यदि प्रमाणं श्रकाकमांसेऽपि भवेत् प्रवृत्तिः ॥

Yaśodhara then attacks the belief that the sacrifice of animals leads to heaven

लोलैर्निद्रैर्लोकमनोऽनुकूलैः स्वाजीवनायागम एष सृष्टः ।

स्वर्गो यदि स्यात् पशुर्हिंसकानां सूनाकृतां वर्हि भवेत् स कामम् ॥

मन्त्रेण शस्त्रैर्गलपीडनाद्वा वेद्यां बहिश्चापि वधः समानः ।

स्वर्गो यदि स्यान्मखहिमितानां स्वबान्धवैर्यज्ञविधिर्न किं तु ॥

‘This Vedic lore was created by sensual persons, favourable to the inclinations of the populace, in order to make their own living, and it is the butchers who would mostly go to heaven if that was the destination of those who killed animals in sacrificial rites. Killing is the same whether it is done at the altar or outside, whether it is accompanied by Vedic formulas or brought about by strangulation or weapons. If the animals killed in sacrifices go to heaven, why is it that one's kinsfolk are not sacrificed?’

Yaśodhara illustrates his point further by a story in which a goat, about to be sacrificed, is represented as saying to the priest:

नाहं स्वर्गफलोपभोगवृषितो नाभ्यर्थितस्त्वं मया संतुष्टस्तृणमक्षणेन सततं हन्तुं न युक्तं त्व ।

स्वर्गं यान्ति यदि त्वया विनिहता यज्ञे ध्रुवं प्राणिनो यज्ञं किं न करोषि मातृपितृभिः पुत्रैस्तथा बान्धवैः ॥

‘I am not eager to enjoy the bliss of heaven nor have I asked thee for it. I am ever content with the eating of grass; it is not right for thee to kill me. Verily, if the animals slain by thee in sacrifices go to heaven, why dost thou not sacrifice thy parents, children and friends?’

Yaśodhara's mother makes no further attempt to argue with her son, and falling at his feet, in spite of his remonstrances, entreats him to accept a compromise in the matter of sacrificing a cock at the altar of Candikā and partaking of its flesh. Yaśodhara agrees most unwillingly, and the debate comes to an end

The discussion between Yaśodhara and his mother belongs to a long series of texts wherein Jaina writers have attacked various tenets and practices of the Brahmanical religion, especially those connected with the sacrifice of animals in Vedic rites. There is in fact a whole literature of such attacks interspersed in Jaina writings in Sanskrit and Prākṛit, but there are few as systematic and comprehensive as that in our work, not to speak of the dramatic realism which characterizes the dialogue.

CHAPTER XIII

JAINISM AND OTHER FAITHS

POPULAR JAINISM

The period of Rāstrakūta hegemony in the Deccan was perhaps the most flourishing epoch of Jainism. Not only in the Rāstrakūta empire but in the feudatory Ganga kingdom (Mysore), the religion of the Arhat enjoyed loyal patronage and esteem and the support of the people, especially of the commercial classes. The ninth and tenth centuries mark, in fact, an era of great expansion of Jaina culture in that part of India in the sphere of religion, philosophy and literature. Somadeva's Yasastilaka, a contemporary record of documentary value, throws considerable light on the position of Jainism and its relation to other religions during an important period of Indian history.

In the Deccan of the tenth century Jainism was, as it has always been, the religion of an influential and ambitious minority, and nowhere in Jaina literature is the propagandist note more clearly heard than in Somadeva's Yasastilaka. It would appear that, as late as the tenth century, the charge of being an upstart religion lacking in the prestige of antiquity was levelled against Jainism; and Somadeva tries to prove the ancient origin of the faith by citing the authority of a number of texts and authors, supposed to contain, according to him, appreciative references to the Jaina creed and Jaina monks.¹ Unfortunately some of the authorities cited by him do not seem to be very old, while there are others of a dubious character, if not altogether spurious, and they do not, on the whole, carry him very far in defending his thesis. For example, Somadeva claims to find a reference to the expedient of worshipping a Jaina monk for the cure of illness caused by his wrath in a verse of the Jyotisa Vedāṅga,² but the verse in question is not found in the latter work and seems to be a quotation from a later astrological text. Similarly, in another text, cited anonymously, Brhaspati is represented as expounding before Indra the Syādvāda doctrine.³ The quotations from Citrakarman and Ādityamata relating to portraits and idols respectively of Jaina Tīrthamkaras⁴ are no doubt authentic and genuine, but the two works cited by Somadeva cannot be very old, although earlier than the tenth century, while Varāhamihira, from whom Somadeva quotes a verse containing a reference to the cult of the Jinas practised by the naked ascetics, flourished only about four centuries earlier than the composition of Yasastilaka.¹ Somadeva then quotes a verse from a work called Nimittādhyāya, which describes the visit of 'ascetics free from worldly ties' as auguring prosperity to a place,² and he obviously takes the expression nirgranthāsca tapodhanāḥ to mean Jain monks. The date of this work is unknown, but it seems to be referred to by Śāntaraksita in Tattvasamgraha (vv 3511 ff). He says that if Vedic authority is required as proof of the omniscience of the Buddha, reference should be made to the Nimitta Śākhā of the Veda wherein the Exalted Buddha, the Omniscient sage, is clearly mentioned by the learned Brāhmanas.³ The Nimitta Śākhā of the Veda seems to be a fiction and is probably the same as the Nimittādhyāya cited by Somadeva, which might be supposed to contain a reference to the Buddha. That the Nimitta Śākhā was not a Vedic school is shown by the statement of Śāntaraksita that the hostility of the Brāhmanas to the Buddha was responsible for the fact that this particular Śākhā was not included among the Vedic schools, although the text concerned, obviously the same as the Nimittādhyāya, could be converted into a Vedic text at will by adding the necessary accents.⁴ However that might be, the citation from the Nimittādhyāya does not further to any great extent Somadeva's argument in support of the antiquity of the Jain religion. Similarly, after citing the texts mentioned above, he goes on to enumerate a large number of poets including Bhāravi, Bhavabhūti, Kālidāsa and Māgha, and claims that the Jain faith enjoys a great reputation in their works.⁵

The anxiety of Somadeva to establish the antiquity of Jainism illustrates the desire of a member of a minority community to enhance the prestige of his faith, so essential for its propagation. The duty of a pious Jain to his religion is clearly formulated in connection with the angas or components of Samyaktva,⁶ and one of his sacred obligations seems to be ganavardhana, expansion of the community, to be carried out by appropriate methods explained by Somadeva in detail.⁷ The evidence of Somadeva clearly shows that while the Jainas were eager to propagate their religion, they were definitely opposed to the admission of undesirable elements to the fold of Jainism, and preferred to welcome those who had voluntarily adopted the faith. At the same time there was a tendency to show considerable latitude to those converts who were unable to forgo completely their former customs and beliefs. As Somadeva says, a person of this category should be given a mixed reception, since the total loss of a new adherent is by no means desirable ¹

As we have already pointed out, Somadeva defends certain Jaina practices which seem to have provoked adverse comment in non-Jaina circles ² The nudity of the Digambara monks was one such example, and there is an interesting episode in Yasastilaka Book V, wherein another attempt is made to justify it Prince Yaśomati is disgusted at the sight of the Jaina monk Sudatta in the garden of the Sahasiakūta temple, and the companion of the prince explains to the merchant Kalyānamitra that the king's displeasure is due to his having seen the inauspicious nude fellow before him Kalyānamitra who is a good Jaina makes a spirited reply, in the course of which he asserts that nudity is natural and it is clothing that is artificial one is nude at birth and during childhood and at the time of enjoying physical comforts, Śiva is nude and so is the recluse who cuts off the tuft of hair on his head. If nudity is objectionable, why is the cow honoured every day ³ It is sinful and harmful objects that are inauspicious, if sages, devoted to the good of all sentient beings, and purified by knowledge, meditation and austerities, are an inauspicious sight, what else can be auspicious in the world ⁴ The frequency with which Somadeva defends the nudity and other practices of the Digambara monks seems to suggest that these were considered to be unattractive features of the Jaina creed in the eyes of non-Jainas, and it was accordingly deemed necessary to remove all misconceptions in regard to them in order that there might not be any obstacles in the path of the propagation of Jainism among the masses.

Jaina propaganda seems to have been subtle and effective In Yasastilaka, Book IV, Yaśodhara's mother describes the Jainas as weaning away the people from other-systems, like thieves, and calls the Digambaras magicians expert in fascinating the world ⁴ It was also part of Jaina propaganda to hold up the tenets of other faiths to ridicule and dilate on the excellence of Jainism. Somadeva, for instance, indulges in unbridled criticism of contemporary non-Jaina faiths and lays emphasis on the essential purity of the Jaina religion. He says among other things that the Omniscient and trustworthy Guide postulated by the Jainas is free from all blemishes, such as the passions, and Jainism condemns even the use of words signifying wine and similar objects how can the wise ever decry a religion like this?¹ Further, it may be noted that Jaina writers often indulge in what is called dharmaparīkṣā or the examination of the relative merits of different religions with a view to demonstrating the superiority of Jainism to the others. Somadeva, for instance, examines in his romance various religions and systems, and enumerates the different theories of salvation held by the non-Jaina schools of thought by way of contrasting them with the Jaina view of Mokṣa, which by implication is claimed to be superior to the rest. Amitagati, who is somewhat later than Somadeva, wrote in 1014 A. D. a treatise called Dharmaparīkṣā to establish the superiority of Jainism to the Brahmanical religion by pointing out the fallacies and weak points of the Purāṇic mythology. It is noteworthy that Dharmaparīkṣās were composed also in Prākṛit, Apabhraṃśa and Kanarese. Vṛttavilāsa (c 1160 A. D.) produced a Kanarese version of Amitagati's Sanskrit work. "it tells how two Kṣatriya princes went to Benares, and in successive meetings with the Brāhmins there, exposed the vices of the gods as related in the sacred books."² Harisena wrote a Dharmaparīkṣā in Apabhraṃśa in 988 A. D., and this again is based on a Dharmaparīkṣā composed by Jayatīma in Prākṛit.³ Lesser in scope but earlier than these is the episode of Dharmaparīkṣā in Uddyotana's Prākṛit romance Kuvalayamālā Book IV.⁴ Here we find that the tutelary goddess Śrī presents king Drdhavarman with a mysterious document, inscribed on a gold plate in Brāhmī characters, and containing what turns out to be the fundamental tenets of the Jaina religion. The next day the king summons an assembly of learned men of different communities and asks them to expound their religious tenets to see whether they correspond to those recorded in the inscription. The Jaina Sādhus alone declare that the doctrines set forth in the document constitute the true faith. Jainism is accordingly declared to be the best of religions, and the king decides to adopt the Jaina faith and enter the monastic order¹. The shortcomings of other religions and the excellence of Jainism form the sum and substance of Jaina propaganda, reminding one of a certain type of Missionary literature of modern times. Dogmatic assertions declaring the supremacy of the Jaina religion are, as is to be expected, frequent in medieval Jaina literature. Vāḍibhasimha, for instance, invites the ambitious man, desirous of the supreme beatitude, to betake himself to the sacred Jaina faith, 'a lion in destroying the elephants, the wrong creeds' (Kṣātracūdāmanī 11. 105).

Nothing could be more incorrect than to assume that the success of medieval Jainism was due solely to subtle and successful propaganda. The latter was no doubt an important factor, but the progress made by the faith and the royal patronage enjoyed by it under the Cālukyas, the Rāṣṭrakūṭas, the Gangas, and the Hoysalas as well as under certain feudatory rulers should be attributed rather to the zeal of a succession of saintly Jaina teachers and the confidence inspired by the intellectual eminence of scholars and writers like Akalamka, Virasena, Jinasena, Gunabhadra, Pampa, Ponna, Puspadanta, Vāḍurāja, Prabhācandra and others. Such men could be expected to hold their own and maintain the prestige of their faith in a world of thought dominated by the leaders of the Brahmanical revival from Śaṅkara and Kumārila to Udayana and Rāmānuja.

The old philanthropic ideals of Jainism seem to have been upheld in the tenth century. In a remarkable verse of Yasastilaka Somadeva gives expression to the religious ideal of the true Jaina devotion to Jina, good will towards all creatures, hospitality to all and an altruistic disposition.¹ The four gifts of protection, food, medicine and religious instruction, which constitute the groundwork of Jaina charity, are duly emphasized by Somadeva in connection with the customary vows of a Jaina householder.² It is, however, necessary to point out a certain parochial attitude noticeable in the matter of according hospitality and rendering charitable assistance to persons who were not adherents of the Jaina faith. Somadeva distinctly says that those who do not possess the Three Jewels, that is, do not believe in the fundamental Jaina dogmas of Right Faith, Right Knowledge and Right Conduct, are not eligible for gifts, and that charity practised in favour of those who hold wrong views and indulge in wrong conduct, that is, all who are outside the pale of Jainism, leads only to evil consequences, like the feeding of serpents with milk. Hospitality towards such people should be limited to a residual portion of food to be taken away, as a Jaina layman is forbidden to entertain them in his house. He is also asked to keep at arm's length members of other communities such as the Buddhists, the Śaivas and the Brāhmanas who perform sacrifices lest familiarity with them should lead to friction and disputes ending in violence.³ Isolation rather than amity based on free social intercourse was the object aimed at in inter-communal relations.

1 The recently published Dhūrtākhyāna of Haribhadra throws further light on the character and composition of the Dharmaparīkṣā texts. Haribhadra's Dhūrtākhyāna, composed in Prākṛit verses in the eighth century, is a lively satire on the Purāṇic legends, and as such allied to the Dharmaparīkṣās of Amitagatī and others, but it is free from the theological bias and the propagandist tone of the latter. Jayarāma's Dharmaparīkṣā is no longer extant, but that of Harisena is available in manuscripts. Harisena says that the Dharmaparīkṣā which was formerly composed by Jayarāma in Gāthā metre is now composed by him in Paddhadiyā metre. A comparison of the Dhūrtākhyāna and the Dharmaparīkṣā of Amitagatī reveals considerable similarities, and it is probable that Jayarāma, who is so far the earliest known among the Dharmaparīkṣā writers, utilized Haribhadra's work for sectarian purposes. See Dr A. N. Upadhye's Introduction to Haribhadra's Dhūrtākhyāna edited by Ācārya Jinavijayaji in the Singhi Jain Series No. 19. See also Dr Upadhye's paper 'Harisena's Dharmaparīkṣā in Apabhraṃsa' in the Silver Jubilee Number of the Annals of the B. O. R. I., vol. XXIII, pp. 592-608.

Jainā writers often attack the Hindu caste system, and we need refer only to the strictures of Jātāsīmhanandī on the theory of castes in his Varāṅgacarita 25. 2 ff. It is, however, well-known that the caste system is prevalent among the present-day Jainas almost to the same extent as among the Hindus; and it has been said that 'in practice the modern Jaina is as fast bound as his Hindu brother in the iron fetters of caste'.⁴ Evidence recorded by Somadeva in Yasastilaka goes to show that conditions were not far different in the tenth century. He says, for instance, that the three higher castes are alone eligible for religious initiation, while all the four including the Śūdras are fit to receive gifts of food.⁵ The status of the Jaina Śūdras does not appear to have been more favourable than that of their brethren in Hindu society.

It was impossible for Jainism to remain unaffected by the influences of local customs, beliefs and cults. Ample testimony is borne to this by diverse religious customs such as the burning of the dead and the offering of rice-balls to the crows on the tenth day, the belief in ghosts and spirits, and the worship of various deities, like Padmāvati¹ Cakreśvari, Padmāvati, Ambikā and Siddhāyikā are, in fact, well-known goddesses of popular Jainism² Of these Somadeva mentions Siddhāyikā as 'a city goddess who has inspired faith in many people' and refers to the pleasance dedicated to her as a refuge for all creatures, in Yasastilaka, Book I³

Medieval Jaina religious Canon seems to have sanctioned, or at least not to have opposed, the observance of local customs and practices. Somadeva says, for instance, that the religion of Jaina householders is of two varieties, laukika and pāralaukika the former is based on popular usage and the latter on the scriptures⁴ The castes, he continues, are without a beginning and so are their observances, it is immaterial whether the Jaina Scriptures or any other Śāstras are accepted as an authoritative guide with regard to them.⁵ Somadeva sums up by observing that it is legitimate for Jainas to follow any custom or practice sanctioned by popular usage so long as it does not come into conflict with the fundamental principles of the Jaina faith or the moral and disciplinary vows⁶ Such views no doubt

Nevertheless she too has a grim aspect, and is invoked in Jaina Tantric texts as Śivā, Candikā, Aghorā etc Ambikā is still worshipped in Jaina temples in various parts of the country There was a temple of Ambikā famous as a place of Jaina pilgrimage at Kodinār in South Kāthiāvāda Bombay Gazetteer, Vol I, part I, p 182 imply a recognition of well-established facts and the unescapable influence of social environment rather than any liberalism in the Jain religious outlook. Further, as we have already pointed out, Jain religious opinion was lenient in regard to those adherents of the faith who could not wholly discard their former beliefs and practices, and this, too, seems to have facilitated the infiltration of non-Jain elements into Jain social and religious usage. Moreover, co-existence with Brahmanism for centuries appears to have influenced Jain religious practice in various other directions. Somadeva describes, for instance, the five Yajñas for the Jain householder, and these are clearly modelled on the five Brahmanical Mahāyajñas, although by Yajña he seems to mean dāna, as explained in a marginal note in Manuscript A.¹ It has also been pointed out that certain Rāstrakūṭa documents, viz. the Konnui inscription of Amoghavarsa I and the Surat plates of Karkka, which record grants made for Jain establishments, make provision inter alia for such typically Hindu religious rites as bahucarudāna, varsvadeva, and agnihotra.² It is no doubt surprising to find provision made for these rites in grants allocated to Jain temples and monasteries, but there seems to be no reason to suppose that the rites in question were 'introduced in these records by the oversight of the imperial secretariat'. Considered in the light of Somadeva's observations cited above, the rites mentioned in the two inscriptions could perhaps be legitimately performed by Jains so long as they did not involve any animal sacrifice, and we seem to find here another instance of Jain adaptation of non-Jain practices. With regard to agnihotra, the Jains were no doubt opposed to the Brahmanical rite, but evidence furnished by South Indian Jain literature clearly shows that the Jains were not opposed to fire ritual, as such. In a learned note published in the Jaina Antiquary Vol. VI, No. II, p. 64, we are told that in Tamil the term Velvi is always used to denote fire ritual, while the expression Veda-Velvi is used in ancient Tamil literature in the sense of Vedic sacrifice. "Whenever the term Velvi is used alone, it merely means fire ritual without involving animal sacrifice. Such a fire ritual has never been condemned by Jains, while they were staunchly opposed to Vedic sacrifice on the ground of Ahimsa. Even now among the Tamil Jains fire ritual is a common thing. During their marriages they do have the characteristic marriage Homam with all its necessary details. Even in temple worship it is a common practice among the south Indian Jains. Hence it is entirely erroneous to conclude that fire ritual is foreign to Jains and that it could not be performed or attended by a Jain". We are also told that the term in the Tamil epic S'ilappadhikāram for such a rite is "Arravelvi, fire sacrifice, according to the doctrine of Ahimsa".

The process of infiltration of non-Jaina elements in Jaina religious practice must have set in before the tenth century, and the gradual transformation of Jainism was already at work when Somadeva formally recognised it and tried to bring it into harmony with the orthodox position of the faith.

OTHER FAITHS

Somadeva attacks various non-Jaina faiths in Yasastilaka which not only throws light on the religious conflict in the tenth century but on the different sects prevalent at the time. The main attacks are directed against Śaivism and its different forms, popular Brahmanism, Vedic sacrifices the Buddhists and the Ājīvakas.

ŚAIVISM—DAKSINA MĀRGA

The relations between Śaivism and Jainism are of paramount importance in view of the prolonged conflict of the two religions particularly in the Tamil country and the Deccan. The main doctrinal points at issue between the two systems have been discussed in previous Chapters, and we may here deal with the place of Śaivism in the religious life of the country in the tenth century and thereabouts. Somadeva, as we have seen, speaks of two broad divisions of Śaivism, the Dakṣiṇa Mārga and Vāma Mārga. The latter mārga represents the grosser form of Śaivism or rather Tantricism, while the former may be said to constitute Śaivism proper.

The Śaiva system recognises three fundamental concepts Patī, Paśu and Pāśa. Patī is Śiva himself, the lord of the Paśus or creatures who are bound by the Pāśas or fetters. These are five or rather four Mala (nescience or mental darkness), Karma, Māyā and the world produced by it, and the obscuring power of Śiva¹. The latter has the power both to bind and release, but release cannot be had without undergoing the consequences of one's Karma. Śiva, accordingly, creates the world to enable the creatures to serve out the full term of their Karma. Ever merciful, he assumes the rôle of a preceptor (ācārya), and accords initiation (dīkṣā), preliminary to final release, to those who have destroyed their

Karma¹ Emancipation consists in union with or absorption in Śiva (Śivasamānatā, sāyujya)²

The Daksina Mārga, as interpreted by Somadeva, seems to represent a sort of monistic system under the influence of Vedāntic ideas Śiva is regarded as the sole ultimate reality, but the system postulates also thirty-six Tattvas or Principles which last till the dissolution of the creation³ They are Śiva, Śakti, Sadāśiva (the volitional aspect of Śiva), Īśvara (the active aspect of Śiva) and Śuddha-vidyā (the omniscient aspect of Śiva), Māyā, Kāla, Niyati (the law regulating the nature of things), Kalā (the urge to activity in creatures), Vidyā (intuition), Rāga (desire including the higher impulse) and Purusa, and Prakṛti, Buddhi, Ahamkāra, Manas, the ten Indriyas, the five Tanmātrās and the five elements It is important to note that Māyā is the constituent material which Śiva stirs into action with his Śaktis in order to create the universe⁴ The universe is accordingly compared to a magic show,⁵ and Śiva is spoken of as identical with Māyā and its product, the universe.⁶ In the ultimate resort Śiva is declared to be the sole Reality⁷ and the Supreme Principle, in which is reflected the universe composed of the thirty-six Principles, just as a town or a village is reflected in a large mirror.⁸ Śiva is the supreme, deathless Absolute (Brahma), the one and the true, subject to no change or modification, self-luminous and beyond the range of mind and speech. He is accompanied by Māyā, and Māyā is at the root of the creation; it is the indestructible germ of the universe, and inspired by Śiva.⁹ The principle of Advaita is, on the whole, consistently maintained, and when Śiva is described as appearing in the form of Māyā and its product, the universe, it is to be understood that the transformation is apparent and not real. The Śaiva system recognises vivarta and not parināma.¹

The Śaiva doctrines corresponding to the Dakṣiṇa mārga mentioned by Somadeva are formulated in Bhoja's Tattvapraṇāśa and the Īśānaśivagurudevapaddhati, an encyclopedic treatise, which quotes Bhoja's work, Jayanta's Nyāyamañjarī and numerous other Śaiva works and authors, and may be assigned to the latter half of the eleventh century or thereabouts. It is noteworthy that the kind of Śaivism represented in the latter compilation is of the ritualistic and mystic type, due importance being given to Mantradikṣā and Kīrtyācaryā or ritual. The history of medieval Śaivism is yet to be written, but it is this form of Śaivism that seems to have been prevalent in Somadeva's time. The quotations and references in the Īśānaśivagurudevapaddhati show that there was a vast amount of Śaiva religious literature extant in the tenth and eleventh centuries. The Svāyambhuva Tantra quoted in the Paddhati enumerates twenty-eight Tantras or Āgamas which expound the doctrines of the Śaiva system, there being two groups of ten and eighteen. The first group consists of Kāmika, Yogaya, Acintya, Kāraṇa, Ajita, Dipta, Sūksma, Saharsa, Amsumat, and Suprabhedaka, collectively known as the S'vabheda Tantras. The second group of Āgamas or Tantras includes Vijaya, Nihśvāsa, Prodgīta, Pārameśvara, Āgneya, Mukhabimba, Svāyambhuva, Raurava, Mākuṭa, Kirana, Lambita, Candrajñāna, Vīrabhadra, Siddha, Sāntāṇika, S'arvodbhāta, Vimala and Vātūla, collectively known as the Rudrabhedaka Tantras. A further quotation from the Svāyambhuva mentions a four-fold division of the Śaiva scriptures into S'ava Tantra, Pāsupata, Vā (Lā) kula and *Somatantra*² and it is stated that Śiva delivers the pure among the creatures from misery by means of these four varieties of Tantras with the help of proper ritual knowledge and Yoga³. The element of Yoga was important in the Śaiva system, and involved intense faith in and devotion to Śiva, in other words, bhaktiyoga, which was no doubt the mainspring of popular Śaivism. The emotional appeal of bhakti is illustrated in the fervent hymn to Śiva composed by the Cedi king Yuvarājadeva II, which is preserved for us in the Bilhari inscription of the rulers of Cedi.¹

The Śaiva system proclaimed the paramount character of the Dharma propounded by Śiva. There was a notable revival of Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika studies in the ninth and tenth centuries,² and the Vaiśeṣika system laid great stress on the cultivation of Dharma. The idea appealed to the Śaiva teachers who admitted the necessity of Dharma for the attainment of salvation, but contended that the Śaiva creed, and not the various other Dharmas propounded by the different scriptures, constituted the paramount Dharma. The Īśānaśvagrudevapaddhati (Kṛyāpāda, 1. 4 ff.) quotes the first of the Vaiśeṣika sūtras and says.

अथातो धर्ममित्यादिसूत्राद् वैशेषिकादत । धर्मप्रयोजन मोक्ष. प्रोक्तश्चाभ्युदयो महान् ॥

ŚAIVA MATHAS AND TEACHERS

The Śaiva system was expounded and taught in the Mathas or monasteries many of which were in existence in central and western India in the tenth century or thereabouts. The Karhad plates of Kṛṣṇa III issued in 959 A. D. record the grant of a village to a teacher named Gaganaśiva, described as a great ascetic proficient in all the S'ivasiddhāntas. He was the pupil of the Ācārya Īśānaśiva, the head of the Valkalesvara Matha in Karahāta (modern Karhād in the Sataṛa district),³ and the purpose of the grant was the maintenance of the ascetics who lived at the place. It may be assumed that the Valkalesvara Matha was large and important enough to have attracted the notice of the Rāstrakūṭa emperor.

A teacher named Gaganaśivācārya, described as an ornament to the spiritual lineage of the sage Durvāsas, is mentioned in a Kanarese inscription issued by Dattāpendra Śrīmāra, a king of the Ālupa family which ruled for many centuries in the Tuluva country corresponding to the modern district of South Kanara and part of North Kanara. The subject of the record is the grant of a plot of land in Kārkala in favour of the Matha to which Gaganasīva belonged¹ If the Gaganasīva mentioned in the inscription, which is not dated, is the same as the teacher named in the Karhad grant of Kṛṣṇa III, it may be presumed that the Valkaleśvara Matha had a branch in South Kanara, of which Gaganasīva was the head. It is noteworthy that Gaganasīva is called in the Karhad grant not the abbot of Valkaleśvara, but a disciple of the abbot Īśānasīva. It is possible that the latter was the head of the matha in Karahāta and the former of the branch in Tuluva. It may be added that the Ālupa kings were Śaivas, and Śaivism was the predominant religion in Tuluva from about the seventh to the thirteenth century, when the Vaiṣṇava movement initiated by Ānandatīrtha came to the fore.²

A few years after the Karhad grant of Kṛṣṇa III we find an ascetic named Prabodhasīva founding a Śaiva Matha in central India, at Chandrehe in Rewa State, then within the dominions of the Cedi kings of Tūpūrī. The relevant inscription is dated in the Kalacuri year 724 corresponding to 972 A. D., and engraved on slabs built into a wall of the monastery, the remains of which still exist at Chandrehe³ The edifice is of considerable size and partly two-storeyed, but the upper storey has for the most part collapsed. Still it is 'a very favourable specimen of Hindu civil or domestic architecture' with spacious rooms and smaller chambers.

Two other Śaiva monasteries built during the rule of the Cedi kings, those of Vaidyanātha and Nauhaleśvara or Nohaleśvara, are earlier than the one at Chandrehe. According to the Bilhari inscription of the rulers of Cedi,⁴ the Vaidyanātha-matha was presented to a teacher named Hrdayasīva by Lakṣmanarāja who ruled about the middle of the tenth century, being the son and successor of Yuvarājadeva I, who has been assigned to the first half of the same century. The Nauhaleśvara Matha was also accepted by Hrdayasīva, but made over by him to his disciple Aghorasīva (vv. 57-8). As noted towards the end of the inscription, the prasasti seems to have been put up at the Nohaleśvara Matha by Aghorasīva, and the monastery no doubt existed at Bilhari, in the Jubbulpore district, where the inscription is said to have been found. The Matha derived its name from Nohalā, the queen of Yuvarājadeva I, and was obviously attached to the Śiva temple caused to be built by her, as stated in the inscription (v. 40).

The Bilhari inscription of Prabodhasīva at Chandiehe and another record of his discovered at Guḡi,¹ in Rewa State, throw light on an influential order of Śaiva monks known as the Mattamayūra family, who propagated the faith in many parts of western and central India from about the ninth to the eleventh century. Prabodhasīva who founded the Chandiehe monastery was a disciple of Pīśāntasīva. The latter built a hermitage (āśrama, siddhasthāna), on the banks of the Sona river at the foot of the Bhramara mountain, and a retreat for the practice of austerities (tapasthāna) on the Ganges, which was held in high esteem by the people of Benares who were devout worshippers of Śiva. Pīśāntasīva is called the ornament of the Mattamayūra family in the Guḡi inscription, and was the disciple of Prabhāvasīva. The latter was induced to settle in the Cedi country by Yuvaiśyadeva I and was presented with a Matha built at an enormous cost (ananta-dhana-pratiṣṭham). Similarly, Lakṣmanarāja, who gave the Vaidyanātha monastery to Hīdayasīva, is described as having brought the sage 'by manifesting his devotion to him by means of presents sent through honest messengers'. The services of the Mattamayūra monks appear to have been freely requisitioned by the Cedi kings, who placed rich mathas at their disposal for the propagation of the Śaiva faith.

Prabhāvasīva was the disciple of Śikhāsīva or Cūdāsīva, who, according to the Chandiehe inscription, was the disciple of Purandara of the holy Mattamayūra family, 'the preceptor of kings'. The latter may be said to have initiated the activities of the Mattamayūra organisation; and to judge from the succession of teachers and disciples, he must have lived not later than the end of the ninth century. An inscription found at Ranod or Narod in Gwalior State, about half-way between Jhansi and Guna, and assigned on palaeographic grounds to the end of the tenth or the beginning of the eleventh century, gives some information about this distinguished teacher.² A king named Avantivarman, who visited Purandara at Upendrapura (Undoi), and was initiated by him in the Śaiva faith, persuaded the sage to migrate to his kingdom, and there in the city of Mattamayūra, Purandara founded a Matha and another establishment at Ranipadra, identified with Ranod. Ranipadra seems to have been a religious centre as it is called a tapovana, also a Yatyāśrama in the Ranod inscription (vv 15, 17-59.). There still exists an old building at Ranod, with an open cloister in front of it with rooms at each end, which most probably served the purpose of a Matha or residence for monks. It is noteworthy that there are two tanks close to each other outside the courtyard, and one of them might be the tank elaborately described in the Ranod inscription, and said to have been excavated by a teacher named Vyomasiva. The latter seems to have lived about the middle of the tenth century, as there is a succession of three teachers between him and Puandara. Kavacasiva, Sadāsiva and Hrdayeśa. Of them Sadāsiva is said to have practised austerities at Ranipadra (v 17). The town and the Matha seem to have fallen on evil days at a later date, and it was Vyomasiva who restored the town to its former prosperity, repaired and improved the dilapidated monastery, installed images of Śaiva divinities, and founded the tank with temples and gardens attached to it (vv 29, 30, 43, 44).

1 The inscriptions of Prabodhasīva are edited and translated in Banerji (op. cit.), App C

Madhumatī, in Mālava, was another important Śaiva religious centre in the tenth century. In the Guṅgi inscription of Prabodhasiva, Madhumatī is described as the abode of the Saiddhāntikas or Śaivas, and it was in fact one of the centres of the Mattamayūra monks. Cūdāsiva or Śikhāsiva, who was, as already mentioned, a disciple of Puandara, is called Madhumatī-pati, 'Lord of Madhumatī', in the Chandiehe inscription. Hrdayasiva, who accepted monasteries from Lakṣmanaiāja, and one of whose predecessors is stated to be Mattamayūranātha in the Bilhari inscription,¹ is described therein as having enhanced the reputation of the Mādhumatēya-vamsa or the family of the Madhumatī monks (v 55). All this shows that the monks of Madhumatī represent a younger branch of the Mattamayūra line of Śaiva teachers.

The Ranod inscription gives the names of the predecessors of Purandara, the founder of the Mattamayūra lineage. They are Kadambaguhādhivāsin 'Resident of Kadambaguhā', after him Śankhamathikādhīpati 'Master of Śankhamathikā', then Terambipāla 'Protector of Terambi'; and lastly, Āmardakatūthanātha 'Lord of Āmardakatīrtha'. Terambi has been identified with Terahī, five miles to the south-east of Ranod, and Kadambaguhā with Kadwara or Kadwāha, about six miles south of Terahī, and where there are even now some old temples and the ruins of many others. Kadambaguhā seems to have been an early centre of Śaivism where lived a long line of saints (Siddhasantati), according to the Bilhari inscription. The sage Rudrasambhu was their revered leader and his disciple was Mattamayūranātha 'The lord of Mattamayūra', who brought spiritual enlightenment to king Avantivarman.² This is a clear reference to Purandara,

2 Verse 49. See Kielhorn's re-interpretation of the verse in Jp Ind., Vol I, p. 353.

but in the Ranod inscription his immediate predecessor is said to be Āmaṇḍakatūthanaṭha

The town of Mattamayūra made so famous by the distinguished line of ascetics named after it has not been identified, but, as suggested by Kielhorn, it must have been somewhere in Central India. As already mentioned, most of the Mathas of the Mattamayūra sect were established in various parts of Central India, in the regions corresponding to Malwa, Gwalior State, Central Provinces and Rewa State. But the Mattamayūra monks appear to have gone further afield, and established a branch in Southern Konkan, as shown by the Khalepatan plates of Rattarāja, dated in Śaka 930 = 1008 A. D.¹ Ratta was a prince of the Śilāhāra family of Southern Konkan, a feudatory of the Cālukyan king Satyāśīlaja, the successor of Taila II. The inscription records the grant of certain villages to a learned teacher named Ātreya for the upkeep of the shrine of Aṇṇeśvara, for providing food and raiment to the resident ascetics and for the benefit of pupils (Chātṛa), learned men and guests. There was obviously a Matha attached to the shrine. Now, the donee Ātreya was a disciple of an ascetic named Ambhojasambhu who belonged to the Kaikaronī branch of the Mattamayūra family, and it is also stated that the yield of the villages granted was for the use of the learned Brahmacārins and Ācāryas of the said branch of the Mattamayūra line of ascetics.²

Another important Matha of the tenth century was the Golakī Matha in the Cedi country, but it does not appear to have been connected with the Mattamayūra line. Golakī or Golagī is said to be a contraction of Golagiri, and the Matha seems to have been in the neighbourhood of Tripurī, the Cedi capital (modern Tewari within six miles of Jubbulpur). According to the Malakāpurīam pillar inscription of the Kākatiya queen Rudra Mahādevī, dated 1261 A. D., the Matha was founded by a Śaiva teacher named Sadbhava Śambhu who was patronized by Yuvarājadeva I of Tripurī, who, as mentioned above, ruled in the first half of the tenth century A. D.³ The inscription mentioned above speaks of another teacher of the same line, named Soma Śambhu, who composed a work called Somasambhupaddhati, and had thousands of disciples, but his exact date cannot be determined, as it is not known how many generations separated him from the founder of the Matha. We are inclined to identify him with the Soma Śambhu quoted several times in the Īśānasivagurudevapaddhati (Kṛyāpāda), specially as the verses cited from him deal with ritual, and the Somasambhupaddhati, to judge from the title, must have been a work on ritual. If our identification of the two authors is correct, Soma Śambhu may be assigned to the latter half of the tenth or the first half of the eleventh century. It may be added that the succession of teachers at the Golakī Matha seems to have continued unbroken till 1261 A. D., the date of the Malakāpuram pillar inscription, which records the grant of a village to a celebrated Śaiva teacher named Viśveśvara Śambhu. The ramifications of the great Matha have, as a matter of fact, been traced, beyond the thirteenth century and the geographical limits of Tripurī, to the Tamil and Telugu lands¹.

A very old Śaiva establishment, much earlier than the tenth century, and associated with the Pāśupata sect, appears to have existed at Kāyāvārohana, also called Kārohana and Kāravana, identified with Kārvaṇ in Dabhoi tāluka in Baroda State. The place is known also as Kāyāvatarāna or Kāyāvātāra. Kaundinya states in the introduction to his Bhāṣya on the Pāśupatasūtras that the Lord, assuming the form (kāya) of a Brāhmaṇa, became incarnate at Kāyāvatarāna, went on foot to Ujjain, and taught his doctrine to Bhagavat Kuśika. The reference here is to the tradition that the Pāśupata doctrine was revealed by Nakulīśa or Lakulīśa, the last of the twenty-eight incarnations of Śiva.

The various incarnations of Śiva are mentioned in Vāyupurāṇa (chap. 23), Lingapurāṇa (chap. 24), S'ivapurāṇa (Vāyaviya-saṃhitā II, chap. 10) and in Kūrmapurāṇa in the last chapter of the first part. The Avatāras begin with Śveta and end with Lakulī, and they are called Yogācāryas in the S'ivapurāṇa. The Vāyu and Linga-purāṇas, which give the more detailed account, mention Kāyāvārohana or Kāyāvātāra as the place where Lakulī manifested himself, along with such famous sites as the Kālāñjara mountain and the Prabhāsa Tīrtha where certain other Avatāras of Śiva are said to have revealed themselves. The Lingapurāṇa makes in this connection particular mention of Pāśupata Vrata, and declares its superiority to Sāṃkhya or the Pāñcarātra discipline. Kārohana is glorified also in the Kāravana-māhātmya, a work of unknown date, which declares it to be a Tīrtha as sacred as Benares and Prayāga, and tells us that Lakulī here merged

1 For the Golakī Matha see Saleore Ancient Karnātaka, Vol. I, p. 362 ff. In a record found in the Madras Presidency, the Kalacuri king Yuvarājadeva is stated to have donated three lakhs of villages to Sadbhava Śambhu, the head of the Golakī Matha. himself in the Brahmeśvara Linga.¹ The characteristic emblems of Lakulīn, a staff in the left hand and a citron in the right, are mentioned in this work.²

An interesting link between Kārvān and the ancient founder of the Pāsupata system is provided by two lingas with the figure of Lakulīn sculptured in front one of them is in the temple of Nakleśvar, and the other in that of Rājrajesvarī, both at Kārvān.³ Lingas with one or four faces of Śiva carved against the linga pillar are quite common, and were installed in temples dedicated to Śiva. It appears, however, that lingas with the figure of Lakulīn carved on them were also installed, evidently by members of the Pāsupata sect.

The Purāṇic texts mentioned above assign four disciples to each of the twenty-eight Avatāras of Śiva. Those of Lakulīn are stated to be Kuśika, Garga, Mitra and Kauṣya. Important light on the date of Lakulīn and Kuśika is thrown by the Mathura Pillar Inscription of Candragupta II dated in Gupta era 61=380-81 A.D.⁴ The inscription records the installation of two lingas called Kapileśvara and Upamiteśvara by a Śaiva teacher named Uditācārya whose pedigree is given. He is described as fourth in succession from Bhagavat Parāśara and tenth from Bhagavat Kuśika. Upamita and Kapila are two other teachers mentioned in the record. Bhagavat Kuśika is no doubt the same as the first disciple of Lakulīn mentioned in Kaundinya's Bhāṣya on the Pāsupatasūtras and the Purāṇic texts. If Uditācārya (380-81 A.D.) is tenth in succession from Kuśika, the pupil of Lakulīn, and we allot a certain number of years to each succeeding teacher, Lakulīn and Kuśika cannot possibly be later than the second century A.D. The Pāsupata centre at Kārvān was thus established sometime in the second century A.D., and Uditācārya's inscription shows that Pāsupata teachers carried on their activities at Mathura in the fourth century A.D. The epigraph tells us that Uditācārya installed

All round the village, chiefly under pipal trees, images and pieces of sculpture and large lingas lie scattered. To the north and east of the village on the banks of a large built pond called Kāsikunda are numerous sculptures and lingas.' Bombay Gazetteer, Vol. I, Pt. I, p. 83.

the lingas, Upamitesvara and Kapilesvara, obviously named after the teachers Upamita and Kapila, in a place called gurv-āyatana, which seems to mean a 'Teachers' shrine', where such memorial lingas appear to have been placed for worship. It is possible that such shrines belonging to the Pāsupata sect existed at other places besides Mathura.

Uditācārya, as stated above, traces his descent to Kuśika, the first disciple of Lakulīn. Another line of teachers who trace their descent to Gaiga, the second disciple of Lakulīn, is mentioned in the Cintra Prasasti of the reign of Śārangadeva of Gujarat, composed in 1287 A D at Somanāthapattana, or Piabhāsa, the famous Śaiva Tirtha, in Kathiawar.¹ It is stated that Śiva became incarnate as Bhattāraka Lakulīśa, the reputed founder of the Pāsupata system, at Kārohana in the Lāta country. He had four pupils named Kuśika, Gārgya, Kaurusa and Maitreya who set themselves to practise particular Pāsupata vows. From them originated four branches or families of ascetics, and to the line established by Gārgya (gārgyagotra) belonged the abbot (sthanādhipa) Kārttikarāsi, his disciple Vālmīkuṇṣī and the latter's disciple Tipuāntaka. These teachers lived in the thirteenth century, but they belonged to an ancient line of Pāsupata ascetics, and were apparently abbots in succession of some Matha in Gujarat.

The tradition recorded above appears to be mentioned also in an inscription of the reign of Naravāhana, king of Mewar, the ancient Medapāta, dated 972 A D.² The inscription is mutilated, but there are clear references to Kāyāvāhana and Śiva with a lakula (staff) in his hand, that is Lakulīn or Lakulīśa, and Kuśika and other sages. The object of the inscription seems to be to record the building of a temple of Lakulīśa³ somewhere in Mewar. It is engraved on a slab built into the wall of a temple called Nāthā's Mandir near Ekalingar's temple, a few miles north of Udaipur. It is obvious that temples of Lakulīśa existed in the tenth century, and an old temple of Lakulīśa is found also at Badāmi, as mentioned below.

The Pāsupata, as noted in Chapter IX, was an influential school of thought in the tenth century, and Pāsupata teachers played an important part in the religious life of Mysore in the eleventh and twelfth centuries.⁴

The influence of Pāśupata teachers and Mathas can also be traced elsewhere in the country. Kalhana tells us in Rājataranginī 5 404 that the king of Kashmir Cakravartman (935 A. D.) constructed a lodge for the Pāśupatas called the Cakra-matha, which, being half built at the time of his murder, was completed afterwards by his widow. Turning to the south, we find that, a few years later, an inscription of the thirtysixth year of the reign of the Cola king Parāntaka I (907-953 A. D.) records a grant of land for the maintenance of certain attendants and offerings in a temple, and for feeding the Śivayogins and the Māhesvaras on the seven festival days beginning with the asterism of Mūla¹. Here the Śivayogins obviously refer to the Śaivas, and the Māhesvaras appear to be Pāśupatas, as Śaṅkara in his Bhāṣya on the Veśāntasūtras II 2 37 refers to the latter as Māhesvaras.

An inscription of the reign of Kumārapāla of Gujarat, dated 1169 A. D., throws interesting light on the career of a distinguished Pāśupata teacher named Bhāva-Brhaspati alias Ganda. The inscription is engraved on a large stone in the side wall near the door of the temple of Bhadrakālī at Somanāthapattana, and tells us that he was a native of Benares and belonged to the Gārgeya-vamśa, that is, to the spiritual lineage of Gārgya, one of the original founders of the Pāśupata sect. Bhāva-Brhaspati left Benares on a tour of pilgrimage and came to Dhārā, and the Paramāra kings are said to have become his disciples. He practised austerities in Mālava and Kanauj and efficiently managed Mathas². Subsequently he came to Gujarat where he cultivated the friendship of the reigning king Jayasimha Siddharāja. The great achievement of Bhāva-Brhaspati was the restoration of the famous temple of Somanātha under the patronage of the next king Kumārapāla, who richly rewarded him for rebuilding the dilapidated edifice³.

A Pāśupata Matha, much earlier than the thirteenth century, existed on Mount Abu in Rajputana. An inscription, dated Samvat 1342 (1285 A. D.), which records the genealogy of the Sisodia kings of Chitore, tells us that the Matha on the hill-top was repaired by Rājā Samarasimha 'who also equipped it with a golden flag-staff' at the request of a Śaiva ascetic named Bhāvaśamkara. The latter was a disciple of Bhāvāgni, a Pāśupata ascetic who was formerly the abbot (sthānādhipa) of the Matha.

The establishment was considered very old at the time of the inscription which calls it anādi ¹

The active influence of a faith is best illustrated by the temples devoted to its cultus, and of no other faith is this so true as of Śaivism during several centuries in India. Some of the most important shrines may be casually enumerated here: Somanātha at Somanāthapattana in Kathiawar, Acaleśvara at Abu, Ekalingaji near Udaipur, Mahākāla at Ujjain, Nilakantheśvara at Udayapura near Bhilsa, Omkāreśvara in the Nimar Dt of Central Province, Viśvanātha etc at Khajuraho, Virāteśvara at Sohagpur, Paraśurāmeśvara etc at Bhuvaneśvara in Orissa, Saṃgameśvara at Badami, (Kailāsa) Īśvara at Elloie, Tārakeśvara at Hangal (Dharwar Dt), Madhukeśvara at Banavasi, Rājasimheśvara at Conjeevaram, etc. A study of the geographical distribution of these Śaiva temples shows the influence and popularity of Śaivism in vast areas of early medieval India until about the 12th century A. D. ²

ŚAIVISM AND JAINISM THE LAST PHASE

The struggle of the Jaina faith with Virāśaivism came in the latter half of twelfth century. In the tenth century Jainism still occupied a privileged position under the patronage of the ruling dynasties in Mysore and the Deccan, and it was about this time that it was in conflict with the prevailing Śaivism of the age. Sectarian controversy was the order of the day, and Somadeva seems to echo contemporary Jaina theological opinion when he denounces Śaivism as a strange medley of mutually contradictory doctrines ³. Others, besides him, appear to have entered the lists against Śaivism. The Mallisena Prasasti tells us that the Jaina teacher Vimalacandra challenged the Śaivas, Pāśupatas and Kāpālikas as well as Bauddhas and Kāpilas to argument, while another teacher Hemasena is declared to have vanquished Śiva himself, like Arjuna (vv. 25, 36)! The Prasasti was composed in honour of the Jaina saint Mallisena who died by fasting at Śravana-Belgola in 1129 A. D., and these two scholars are mentioned in a list of Digambara teachers who preceded Mallisena ⁴. Hemasena is mentioned just before Dayāpāla and Vādirāja, both of whom lived in the first quarter of the eleventh century, and just after Matisāgara, the guru of Dayāpāla. Hemasena may possibly be assigned to the end of the tenth century. Then, there are six teachers between Matisāgara and Vimalacandīa, who may have lived in the first half of the tenth century, and was perhaps a contemporary of Somadeva.

Similar claims of Śaiva teachers triumphing over their Jaina opponents are occasionally met with. The Ranod inscription states that a celebrated teacher named Vyomasīva silenced among others the Jainas who are contemptuously likened to jackals (v. 39). Vyomasīva was a native of Central India, and as already mentioned, he may be assigned to about the middle of the tenth century. Another distinguished opponent of Jaina teachers was Vādi-Rudraguna of whom we shall speak later.

One of the points at issue in the Śaiva-Jaina controversy was the position of the Arhats as superhuman universal teachers. The Śaivas contended that the Jaina conception of the Arhat was wholly inadequate: if he was an omniscient teacher, we must ask who his teacher was, and if he was a saint devoted to austerities, there must be some one to vouchsafe the result of his efforts. In either case, it was necessary to postulate a superior Being, self-existent and without a beginning, and He was no other than Mahēśvara or Śiva. The Śaiva contention that Śiva was the guru of the Jaina Tirthamkaras is recorded by Somadeva in Yasastilaka,¹ while the claim that He confers on the Arhat, who is conditioned in time, the reward of the latter's religious austerities is put forward in Īśānasvāguru-devapaddhati (Kṛyāpāda 1 39 ff.).²

Jainism began to lose ground from about the eleventh century following the subversion of the Rāstrakūṭa empire and the Ganga kingdom, which were its principal mainstay. Śaivism, on the other hand, continued to make fresh conquests under the Cālukyas of Kalyāṇi, while the Colaś, who conquered Mysore early in the eleventh century, were its most ardent champions. Interesting light on the prestige and eminence of the Śaiva teachers of the age is thrown by an inscription of the reign of the Cālukya king Jayasīma II, dated 1036 A. D., which records certain grants of land made to a Śaiva scholar named Vādi-Rudraguna Lakulīśvara Pandita for the repairs of the temple of Pañca Līṅga, at Balligāve, 'the royal city of Banavase 12000'.³ Vādi-Rudraguna, described in the inscription as a falling star to the Digambara speakers, defeated in argument a number of eminent

Jaina teachers including the famous scholar and poet Vādmāja. The Pañca Linga temple was an important educational centre of the Kālamukha order of Śaiva ascetics, being called 'the Kālamukhi Brahmacāri-sthāna of Balligāve', and the grants in question were made not only for the upkeep of the temple and the worship of the god but for the provision of food and clothing for the students and ascetics. The Kedāra Matha of Balligāve was even a more important Śaiva religious and educational institution. An inscription of the reign of Bijjala, dated 1162 A. D., gives a remarkable picture of the great establishment, called in the record 'Kodiya Matha, the place of the Southern Kedāra', while the deity worshipped in the temple is referred to as 'Dakṣiṇa Kedāreśvara of the Kodiya Matha' ¹. The Matha was not only a place of worship but a great centre of learning and a well-organised charitable institution for the destitute and the sick. It is described in the inscription as "the place appointed for the performance of the rites of devotee Brahmacāri-Śivamunis, the place for the recital of the four Vedas with their Angas, the place for commentaries on the Kaumāra, Pāṇinīya, Śākatāyana, Śabdānuśāsana and other grammars, the place for commentaries on the Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Mīmāṃsā, Sāmkhya, Bauddha and (other systems); the place for commentaries on the Lākula-siddhānta, the Pātañjala and other Yoga-śāstras, the place for the eighteen Purāṇas, the Dharmasūtra, all poems, dramas, comedies and every branch of learning, the place where food is freely distributed to the poor, the destitute, the lame, the blind, the deaf, the place for the treatment of the diseases of destitute sick persons, a place of security from fear for all living things". 'The Southern Kedāra' is described also as "the means of the absolution of sin, the very presence of Śiva manifested to all the citizens" A celebrated Śaiva teacher Vāmasakti Pandita, designated as Rājaguru, was the head of the Matha at the time, and Bijjala, washing the feet of the guru, made various grants of lands "for the decoration of the god Dakṣiṇa Kedāreśvara, for gifts of food to the ascetics, for gifts of learning, for repairs of the temple". On the same occasion he made grants to two other Śiva temples, those of Somanātha and Brahmeśvara at Abbalūr ². Bijjala may have had Jaina leanings, but there is no doubt that he was a patron of Śaivism. It is hardly necessary to point out that it was during his reign that the aggressive Viraśaiva cult came into prominence and imposed serious handicaps on the further progress of the Jaina faith in South-Western India. Viraśaivism weaned away the commercial classes who were the chief supporters of Jainism, and whole clans, like the Cangālvas were converted from Jainism to the Vīśāiva faith¹ The influence of the new sect is illustrated by the fact that an important Jaina centre like Bankapur, in the Dharwar district, which had five religious colleges of the Jainas in 1055 A. D., came to have a Hindu population, the greater part of whom were Lingāyats.² It is also said that Lingāyats appropriated a large number of Jaina temples in the Kanarese districts and installed in them the linga as the object of worship³ Prior to this, Jaina temples appear to have suffered considerable damage during the Cola invasions of the Cālukyan dominions in the eleventh century The 'base Cola' (Rājādhuāja I who was killed in the battle of Koppam in 1054 A. D.) is said to have burned down many temples and defiled and damaged Jaina sanctuaries in the Belvola province during the reign of Someśvara I The damage seems to have been repaired to some extent by Lakshma, the governor of Belvola, who, in 1071 A. D., restored the Jaina temple at Annigeri, in the Dharwar district, which had been burned down by the Cola invader.⁴

Among the Śaiva sects the Pāsupatas appear to have been very influential in the Mysore country in the eleventh and twelfth centuries The name of Lakulīśa, the founder of the system, occurs very often in the Mysore inscriptions, and the creed is referred to as the Lākulāgama, Lākulāmnāya and Lākula-samaya An inscription of 943 A. D. says that Lakulīśa, fearing lest his name and works of merit should be forgotten, became incarnate as the muninātha Chulluka As mentioned above, a grant was made in 1036 A. D. in favour of Vādi-Rudraguna, styled as Lakulīśvara Pandita An inscription of about 1078 and two others of 1094 and 1103 mention respectively Vālmiki-muni, Śīkantha-pandita and his son Someśvara-pandita, all of them distinguished exponents of the Lākula creed

Also Sastri The Colas, Vol. I, p 311 Belvola is an old Kanarese word meaning a field of standing corn The name was given to the fertile district near the centre of which are Dambal, Gadag and Lakkundi, in the Dharwar district Bombay Gazetteer, Vol XXII, pp 392, 718 There still exist a number of old Jaina temples in this area, at Aminbhāvi (near Dharwar town), Annigeri (between Dharwar and Gadag), Chabbi (about eight miles south of Hubli), Lakkundi (about seven miles south-east of Gadag), Mulgund (about twelve miles south-west of Gadag), and Soratur (about ten miles south of Gadag) Bombay Gazetteer (op. cit), chap. XIV.

The latter is said to have caused the Lākula-siddhānta to blossom. Further, two inscriptions of 1168 and 1179 compare the rājaguru Vāmaśakti with Lakulīśvara or Nakulīśvara. Another record mentions a succession of gurus of the Agastyeśvara Matha at Śrīparvata, all whose names end in śakti. The Lākula or Pāśupata system is generally mentioned in the Mysore inscriptions in connection with the Kālāmukha sect,¹ and there is no doubt that the Pāśupatas were known as Kālāmukhas in the Kannada country. The technical expression Kālam Karceṇ (laving the feet) used in Kannada inscriptions on the occasion of making a gift to the teachers of this sect is an indication of the high respect shown to them². These Kālāmukha Pāśupatas were not certainly identical with the Kālāmukhas mentioned by Yāmuna Muni and Rāmānuja in their enumeration of Śaiva sects, as the latter were no better than Kāpālikas.

The mantle of the Pāśupatas appears to have fallen on the Vīraśaivas to a very great extent in the Kannada country. Many of the great Kālāmukha Mathas seem to have been transformed into Vīraśaiva Mathas. The Kālāmukha Matha at Pūvali, the modern Hūli in the Belgaum District of Bombay Province, which had many branches and a succession of influential abbots, as recorded in a number of inscriptions, is now a Vīraśaiva Matha, and provides a striking illustration of the process of transformation³.

Vīraśaivism represented a mass movement, and was a more serious rival of Jainism. It was also a movement of social reform, and at variance with orthodox Hinduism in several respects. The rapid expansion of this powerful, hostile sect had an adverse effect on the subsequent history of Jainism in the South. Vīraśaivism gathered momentum under the inspiring leadership of Basava, the minister of Bijjala (1162-67 A. D.) who had taken possession of the Cālukyan throne. Kalyāna (now in Bidar District, Hyderabad State), the capital of the later Cālukyas, became the centre of direction of the new religious movement. The devotional literature of the Vīraśaivas known as the Vacanaśāstras composed in Kanarese prose goes back to the eleventh century A. D., about a century earlier than the age of Basava, but the literary and religious movement reached its climax about the middle of the twelfth century during the period of the activities of Basava and his contemporaries Jedara Dāsimaṃyṃya, one of the early Vacana writers, is believed to have been a contemporary of the Cālukya king Jayasimha I whose reign covers the greater portion of the first half of the eleventh century A. D. The principal writers and leaders of the movement, however, belong to the latter half of the next century. Among the contemporaries of Basava may be mentioned Ekāntada Rāmaṃyṃya, a vigorous propagandist who is said to have destroyed Jaina temples, Prabhudeva who was the head of the Virakṃta-maṃtha at Kalyāṃna, the pontifical seat known as Śūṃnya-simhāsana 'The throne of the void', Cennabasava who seems to have led the movement after Basava, Siddharāma who is known as Śivaṃyogin, and several others

The doctrines and social practices of the Viraśaivas are beyond the scope of our discussion. It may, however, be noted that the apostles of Viraśaivism laid great stress on intense devotion (bhakti) to Śiva, and owed a good deal to the teachings of the great Śaiva saints of the Tamil land. 'Indeed the Viraśaiva saints claimed the Tamilians as their own, and the Kannada Viraśaiva literature teems with accounts of the Tamil Śaiva saints.' More important for us is the fact that Viraśaivism 'spread like wild fire over a considerable portion of the Deccan and southern India'. It enjoyed extensive patronage and privileges under the Vijayanagara kings. It was the religion of the Keladi or Ikkeri chiefs who ruled a considerable portion of the Vijayanagara empire. The ancestors of the present rulers of Mysore were Lingāyats till the 18th century¹. Of all the rivals of Jainism Viraśaivism seems to have been the most potent, and still continues to play an important rôle in the social and religious life of South-western India.

Apart from the rise of Viraśaivism, the loss of royal patronage following the overthrow of the Rāstrakūṃtas and the Gangas placed Jainism at a disadvantage in its encounter with rival creeds. The reorganisation of Vaiṃṃnavism by Rāmāṃnuja and the conversion of the Hoysala king Bittideva (Viṃṃṃṃnuvaidhana) by the latter at the end of the eleventh century was another blow to the prospects of Jainism in the south. Most of the Jaina centres in Karnāṃtaka (Paudanapura, Hanasoge, Humcca, Balligāme etc.) ceased to be strongholds of Jainism, and "in the centres which fell into the hands of the non-Jainas, only mutilated Jaina images and broken slabs bear silent testimony to the once prosperous condition of Jainism in the country".² It has been said of Balligāme that, like many a great

Jaina centre, it today possesses no traces of Jaina worship except broken Jaina images¹ Still when we speak of the decline of Jainism in Kainātaka we should think in terms of a setback rather than any progressive decay or deterioration It has been rightly pointed out that Jainism did its best work in the best days of the Rāstrakūtas in the Southern Mahāratta country and Mysore. "These are the portions of South India that happen to be great Jaina centres even now, and in that region Jainism flourished even in the age of the great Colas Jainism continued to flourish under the Cālukyas and under the Hoysalas at a later time and even in the age of Vijayanagar"² It has indeed been said of the Hoysalas that, though they were Jainas first, and later changed over to Vaisnavism, they still built temples dedicated to Tīrthankaras, Śiva and Viṣṇu, and were patrons of all sects alike.³

Any talk about the conflict of Śaivism and Jainism during the period under consideration might be misleading if we failed to point out that the two faiths existed side by side, generally speaking, in an atmosphere of toleration and amity in various parts of the country This is proved by the existence of imposing Jaina temples in such important centres of Śaiva worship as Khajurāho in Bundelkhand or Un in southern Indore At Khajurāho where the temples were mostly built during the reigns of Yaśovarman and Dhanga (c 930-1000 A D), we have the large and fine temple of Jīnānātha, which has an inscription of 954 A D , and was built in the beginning of Dhanga's reign The Ghantaī Jaina temple, so called from the bells carved on the pillars, has been partially rebuilt from older materials The original temple is believed to have been erected in the tenth century A D ⁴

4 Vincent Smith (op cit) in IA, 1908, P 133 There are several other Jaina temples at Khajurāho No 26 in Cunningham's list is an ancient temple 'restored with plaster and old stones and called Setnāth, which is most probably the original name, as the principal statue enshrined is a colossal standing figure of Ādinātha, 14 feet in height with the title of Setnāth 'On the pedestal of this statue Cunningham found on his first visit an inscription dated in Samvat 1085, or A D 1028 No. 27 in his list is a small ancient Jaina temple now dedicated to Ādinātha There are many Jaina statues, both whole and broken, collected about these temples, with dated inscriptions One of them is inscribed on a pedestal of a colossal seated statue, and records that the image was dedicated in Samvat 1215 (A D. 1158) during the reign of Madanavarman. Archaeological Survey of India, Vol. II, p. 412 ff

The Un group of temple has been assigned to the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Here we have a large Jaina temple, Chaubara Deia No. 2, 'which in spite of the loss of its śikhara still remains one of the most beautiful monuments at Un.' The building has a very large porch in front of the mandapa. The second Jaina temple at Un is very well-preserved and popularly known as Goaleśvara. The floor of the garbhagrha is about ten feet lower than that of the mandapa, and one has to descend a series of steps. Inside the sanctum stand three huge Digambara Jaina images, one of which measures twelve and a half feet in height. The images bear short inscriptions which give 1206 A. D. as the date of their dedication. Several other large Jaina images have been found at Un, one of which bears the date 1125 or 1135 A. D.¹

Jaina religious edifices are also found in close proximity to the island of Māndhātā in the Naimadā, in the Nimar District of Central Provinces. 'On the island itself, every temple is dedicated to Śiva or his associate deities, but the north bank of the river opposite, in addition to Śaivite ruins, contains several old structures devoted to Viṣṇu, and a whole group of Jaina temples.' 'The Jaina temples stand on an elevation overlooking, but a little retired from the river. The largest building raised on a plinth of basalt blocks five feet high was perhaps a monastery. It consisted of a quadrangle 53 feet by 43 feet, surrounded by four rows of pillars about 10 feet high. The eastern wall is still complete, decorated with geometrical figures rudely carved in yellow sandstone. On each side of the doorway is a figure carved on slabs about 2 feet high, with Śaivite and Jaina emblems curiously intermixed. To the north stood the temple proper, built in a pyramidal shape, with numerous smaller spires. The porch is still erect, but the shrine has been buried beneath the ruins of the dome. The third building was a smaller temple raised on a pyramid of basalt blocks about 25 feet high.'²

Interesting sidelight on Śaiva-Jaina relations is provided by the religious history of Mount Abu, which was an early and famous seat of Śaiva worship. The Abu region was subjected by Bhīma I of Gujarat early in the second quarter of the eleventh century A. D., and the Jaina Vimala Sāha, the first great exponent of marble architecture in India, was sent out as the governor of Abu. It appears that Jaina religious edifices had not existed on the sacred mountain before his time. The magnificent marble temple of Ādinātha was built at Delwara (Devalwada) on Mount Abu by Vimala Sāha in 1031 A. D.; and there is a significant tradition associated with the building of the shrine. It is said that the site on which the edifice now stands was formerly occupied by Brahmanical temples, but 'this devout Jaina offered to cover with silver coins as much ground as was required for his temple in return for the permission to erect it. This munificent offer was accepted'¹

It is not necessary to mention the existence of Jaina cave temples at Ellora, the home of stupendous rock-cut temples dedicated to Śiva, as the caves here have been assigned to the Rāstrakūta period, which coincided with the heyday of Jainism in the Deccan and Mysore. Apart from occasional acts of vandalism, Śaiva-Jaina relations do not appear to have been marred by anything more serious than theological disputes or religious controversies.²

ŚAIVISM—VĀMĀ MĀRGA

The Vāma Mārga, as defined by Somadeva, may be said to represent the grosser form of the Śaiva and Tāntric cults and includes sects like the Kaulas and the Kāpālikas. We have already discussed Somadeva's account of the practices of the Kaulas who are represented as avowed sensualists

1 Commissariat History of Gujarat, Vol I, p 1211

2 Jaina temples are said to have been demolished during the invasion of Gujarat by the Paramāra king Subhatavarman early in the thirteenth century A. D. Ganguly History of the Paramāra Dynasty, p 197. As against this, we may point to the flourishing condition of Jaina culture and religion in Malwa from the latter part of the tenth century onwards, which will bear comparison in its own way with the efflorescence of Jainism during Rāstrakūta hegemony in the Deccan, or under the Solankis in Gujarat. The harmonious relation of the various faiths in medieval Mālava is shown also by the co-existence of Jaina and Vaisnava temples at several places in Northern Indore. At Kohala, six miles from Bhanpura, to the east of the temple of Laksmī-Nārāyana, there are two Jaina temples side by side and known by the popular name of sas-bahu-ka-mandir or the temples of the mother-in-law and the daughter-in-law, one of which is used for worship even now. At the village of Sandhārā, not far from Bhanpura, the remains include an old temple of Viṣṇu and a Jaina temple called Tambola-ka-mandir or the temple of the betel-seller as well as two other Jaina temples, which have been partly rebuilt at a later date. These two temples are dedicated to Ādinātha and belong to the Digambara community, and regular worship is carried on in both. Two old temples, one dedicated to Viṣṇu and the other to Pārśvanātha, stand in the centre of the village of Kukdesvar, ten miles to the west of Rampura in the northern part of Indore State. It is noteworthy that the Jain temple contains a large bas-relief representing scenes from the life of Kṛṣṇa, which has been built into the south wall of the mandapa. For details see Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, for the year ending 31st March, 1920 and worshippers of Śiva¹ It is related in Śāṇḍapurāṇa, Prabhāsakhaṇḍa (Chap. 119 of Prabhāsakṣetra-māhātmya) that when the great goddess of the Prabhāsakṣetra killed the demons Bala and Atibala and their army, some of the demons who escaped became Kaulas, addicted to meat, wine and women. This seems to be in accord with current description of the Kaulas, but it is an irony that the Purāṇa should have stated also that certain of the demons became Jainas, who were bitterly hostile critics of the former sect. Jayanta in Nyāyamañjarī (chap. 4) hints at the objectionable practices of the Kaulas aimed at the attainment of superhuman powers, but as, in this context, he records the views of certain thinkers that all religious systems are authoritative in their own way, he is inclined to put Kaula ritual on a par with such malevolent Vedic rites as the Śyena performed for the purpose of destroying one's enemies.

That the Kaula cult was prevalent in the tenth century is shown not only by the evidence furnished by Somadeva but by that of Rājaśekhara and Devasena, both of whom belong to the first half of the century. In Rājaśekhara's play Karpūramañjarī 1. 22 ff the master magician Bhairavānanda declares that he is an adherent of the Kaula way, drinks wine and enjoys women and so goes forward to salvation. He describes the Kaula religion as charming to all, as its only requirements are a hot trumpet for wife, plenty of meat and wine, alms and a pelt to serve as bed, and opines that while gods like Hari and Brahmā prescribe meditation, the study of the Vedas, and sacrifices as leading to final release, Śiva has the sole credit of having devised a way to salvation consistent with the pleasures of love and wine. The Jaina Devasena gives a similar picture of the Kaula cult in his Bhāvasamgraha (verses 182-3). Rājaśekhara's verse (Karpūramañjarī 1. 23) :

रण्डा चण्डा दिक्खिन्ना धम्मदारा मज्झं मसं पिज्जए खज्जए अ ।

भिक्षा भोजं चर्मखण्डं च सेजा कोलो धम्मो कस्स णो आइ रम्मो ॥

may be compared with Devasena's description of the Kaula religion in Bhāvasamgraha

रडा सुंडा थंडी सुंडी दिक्खिन्दा धम्मदारा सीसे कता कामासत्ता कामिया सा वियारा ।

मज्झं मसं मिट्ठं भक्खं भक्खियं जीवसोक्खं च कडले धम्मे विसये रम्मे तं जि हो सगमोक्ख ॥

It is also noteworthy that Devasena, while describing Cārvāka doctrines in the above work (verses 172-76), attributes them to Kaulācārya or the teacher of Kaula doctrines. The Cārvākas or Lokāyatikas were no doubt distinct from the Kaulas, but the insistence of the latter on rank sensualism seems to have led Devasena to identify them with the Cārvākas.

Hemacandra says in his commentary on his Yogasāstra 4. 102 that the disciples of the Kaulācāryas are known as Yogins¹ It may be noted that in Karpūramāñjarī the Kaula Bhānavānanda is often referred to as yogīśvara (Yogīśvara), the great Yogin or adept in mystic rites Kaula dikṣit is likewise referred to in a double entendre in Nalacampū (chap 2)²

The Kaulas were akin to the Kāpālikas, and both the Kaula and the Kāpālika cults were anathema to the Jainas In Yasastilaka VI 3 Somadeva prescribes a bath for Jaina monks when they happen to come in contact with a Kāpālika³ We learn from Yāmunācārya's Āgamapramānya (about 1050 A D) that the characteristics of the Kāpālikas were the sacred thread, the smearing of the body with ashes, a crest jewel, various ornaments for the ears and the neck, a human skull and a club According to them, he who realises the true significance of the six symbols (sacred thread, ashes, crest-jewels, karmikā, kundala and rucaka), and meditates on the Self, mentally locating it on the female organ, attains the supreme beatitude⁴ Additional information about the Kāpālika sect is furnished by Kṛṣṇamīśra's allegorical play Prabodhacandodaya, Act III, which introduces a Kāpālika who recounts his beliefs and practices He wears a garland of human bones, lives on cremation grounds and uses a skull as a dish Describing his religion, he declares that it consists of the worship of the Mahābhairava form of Śiva with human sacrifices human flesh is offered as an oblation in the fire, and the worshipper drinks wine from a skull Not only Mahābhairava but his consort (Mahābhairavī) is worshipped with blood along with a host of goblins called up to the beating of drums As regards his beliefs, the Kāpālika declares that the world, full of diversities, is not different from Śiva⁵ The Kāpālika ideal of salvation is to become incarnate in a form like that of Śiva and enjoy the pleasures of love with a consort beautiful as Pārvatī This doctrine is said to have been revealed by Śiva himself, as there can be no happiness without mundane joys, and a state of salvation in which the Self subsists in its pristine condition, like a block of stone, without any consciousness of joy, cannot be a desired goal⁶ This is the sum and substance of the Kāpālīka doctrine, called also Mahābhairavānusāsana, Paramesvara-siddhānta, and Somasiddhānta in Kṛṣṇamīśra's play. Like Bhairavānanda in Rājasekhara's Karpūramāñjarī, the Kāpālīka in Prabodha-candrodaya puts forward exaggerated claims of miraculous powers, and one of the avowed objects of the Kāpālīka cult is the attainment of the supernatural Yogic powers known as the *Siddhis*¹. It is noteworthy that the Kāpālīka is once addressed in the play as Kulācārya², which shows that, although the Kaula and the Kāpālīka cults were distinct from each other, Kāpālīkas were sometimes confused with Kaulas owing to certain resemblances in their practices. The Kaulas are not, as a rule, associated with human sacrifices; yet it is at the instance of a Kulācārya that Māladatta orders preparations for a human sacrifice in the Mahābhairava temple in Yasastilaka, Book I. Members of both sects would seem to have indulged in objectionable practices, but it was the Kāpālīkas who were more prominently connected with rites involving the sacrifice of human beings.

In the fourth Act of Kṛṣṇamīśra's Candakausika, composed in the first half of the tenth century, Dharma appears in the guise of a Kāpālīka, armed with a club, and carrying a skull in his hand, and decorated with ashes and human bones. He declares that he is about to attain certain magical powers: control over a goblin who has entered into a corpse, possession of a thunderbolt and magic pills and paints, union with a demoness, and the knowledge of alchemy (dhātuvāda) and the elixir of life (rasāyana). There is no doubt that the Kāpālīkas were charlatans and adepts in black magic, but those who sought to discover the elixir of life and practised alchemy were not necessarily Kāpālīkas.

That the Kāpālīka cult is much earlier than the tenth century is shown by the wellknown episode in Bhavabhūti's Mālatīmādhava, Act V, in which the Kāpālīka Aghoraghanta attempts to sacrifice Mālatī before the goddess Kaiālā or Cāmundā³. This episode is based on the story of Vidyāsaka in Kathāsaritsāgara 3. 4. 158 ff, or rather on Guṇādhya's Brhatkathā, of which the former work is a summary. Although the fanatic, who attempts to sacrifice king Ādityasena's daughter before the idol of 3 A drunken but otherwise innocent Kāpālīka appears in the Mattavilāsaprahasana of the Pallava King Mahendravikramavarman (first quarter of the 7th century A.D.). About the same time Hsuan-tsang met the first Hindu ascetics of his journey at Kāpisi, north of Kabul: they had their bodies smeared with ashes and wore a chaplet made of skulls. They were no doubt Śaiva ascetics, but probably not Kāpālīkas. Grousset In the footsteps of the Buddha, p. 93.

Kātyāyanī in the story of Vidūsaka, is called a Pravrajaka or Paivrajaka, there is no doubt that he is a Kāpālaka. In another story in Kathāsaritsāgara 18.2 a Kāpālaka draws a married woman named Madanamañjarī to a cremation ground for an evil purpose by force of magic formulas and oblations in the fire, but is foiled in his attempt by the intervention of the great king Vikramāditya. In Haribhadra's Samarāñcakahā, Book IV, the gambler Maheśvaradatta becomes a Kāpālaka and an expert in gāruḍa-mantra, mystic formulas for curing snake-bites. The machinations of a Kāpālaka and his grim ritual are vividly portrayed in the eighth Act of Rāmacandra's Kaumudīmitrānanda. Makaranda in the play allows Kaumudī and Sumitīā to take shelter in a subterranean chamber as a protection against the alleged designs of a Vidyādhara. Meanwhile the Kāpālaka offers oblations of human intestines in the fire and attempts to revive what is apparently a corpse which rises and strikes him. The Kāpālaka and his accomplices manage to disappear, but Makaranda finds no trace of the chamber or the ladies concealed therein. The episode throws light on certain nefarious tactics of the Kāpālikas as seen by a writer of the twelfth century.

Kāpālikas were known also as Mahāvratins. Jagaddhara in his commentary on Mālatīmādhava, Act I, explains the term Kāpālikavrata as Mahāvratā, and Candapāla in his commentary on Nalacampū (Chap 6) explains Mahāvratikas as Kāpālikas. In Kathāsaritsāgara 5.2.81 a Mahāvratin is described as Kapālin ('furnished with a human skull'), wearing matted hair, and white with ashes. In Yasastilaka 1.115 Death is pictured as a Mahāvratin or a Kāpālaka, and the skeleton of a beautiful woman as his club¹. In the description of the shrine of Candamārī in Yasastilaka, Book I, Somadeva mentions 'Mahāvratin heroes selling for a price flesh cut from their own bodies'². The uncanny practice of selling human flesh, one's own or that of a corpse, to goblins for the purpose of gaining a desired object is often referred to in Sanskrit literature, and seems to have been resorted to not only by Kāpālikas but by others in desperate circumstances. The love-sick Mādhava appears on the cremation ground in Mālatīmādhava, Act V, with a lump of human flesh for sale to the goblins. The practice is referred to in at least two stories of Kathāsaritsāgara (5.2.180 ff and 18.2.53 ff). In the first story the brave Aśokadatta goes to a cremation ground on the fourteenth night of the dark half of the month, and offers to the goblins a corpse for sale, the price being a marvellous anklet required by the king of Benares In the second story a gambler, who has promised to supply human victims to two Brahmarāksasas, is at a loss to find them, and repainging to a cremation ground at night, offers to sell human flesh to a goblin in return for a temporary loan of the latter's form and powers wherewith to procure the required victims from among his enemies In Bāna's Harsacarita (Chap. 5) the sale of human flesh (to goblins) by princes is mentioned among the various rites performed for the recovery of Prabhākaravardhana in the latter's capital.¹ The same work (chap. 6) records the story of a prince, apparently of Ujjayinī, who was killed by a goblin, being over-zealous in the matter of selling human flesh on the occasion of the festival of the Mahākālā Śiva.² Another reference to the sale of flesh occurs in the third chapter of Harsacarita.³

As pointed out by R. G. Bhandarkar, a copper-plate charter of Nāgavardhana, nephew of Pulakesin II, records a grant of a village near Igatpuri in the Nasik District for the worship of the god Kāpāleśvara and the maintenance of the Mahāvratins residing in the temple This shows that the Kāpālīka sect existed in Mahārāstra about the middle of the seventh century.⁴ The practice of carrying a skull and a club is mentioned among the religious customs of non-Buddhist sects enumerated in Lalitavistara, chap. 17.⁵ This is a clear reference to the Kāpālīka sect in an important work of Buddhist Sanskrit literature composed before, probably long before, the ninth century. It is evident from Bhavabhūti's statements in Mālatīmādhava, Act I, that in his time (eighth century) Śrīparvata, a holy mountain in Kurnool District (Madras Presidency) on the Kistna river, was a centre of the Kāpālīka cult.⁶ There is a reference to a Matha of the Mahāvratins in an inscription from Ramnad District (Madras Presidency) of the reign of Vīra Pāṇḍya, showing that the Kāpālīkas were well-established in that part of South India in the second half of the tenth century. It is stated in another record issued by a chieftain named Vikramakesari, a contemporary of Vīra Pāṇḍya, that the former presented a big Matha to a certain Mallikārjuna of Madura, who was the chief ascetic of the Kālamukha sect¹ The latter community was akin to the Kāpālikas and both sects indulged in similar practices The Kālamukhas are in fact included among the Mahāvīratikas or Kāpālikas in Trivikrama Bhatta's Nalacampū composed early in the tenth century (Chap 6)² The Kāpālikas are accused of cannibalism in Yaśahpāla's Mohanājapārājaya 4 23, an allegorical drama composed during the reign of Ajayapāla of Gujarat (1172-1176 A D)³

BRAHMANISM

Somadeva's strictures on the beliefs and practices of popular Hinduism have been summarized in Chapters X and XII The chief attacks are directed against the Pūrāṇic traits of the principal Brahmanical deities, the funeral rites (Śrāddha), bathing at sacred sites, and diverse religious practices collectively designated as mūḍha or mūḍhatā, 'stupid customs.'⁴ These attacks while throwing light on the religious conflict in the tenth century are not peculiar to Somadeva, and should rather be regarded as forming part of the customary Jaina polemics against the Brahmanical faith Such polemics are scattered throughout Jaina literature of all periods, and we may cite here only a few examples bearing on the topics criticized by Somadeva Jātā-simhanandī's Varāṅgacarita (circa 7th century A. D) has a Canto called Mithyāśruti-vighātaka (XXV), which criticises among other things the caste system, the Brahmins dependent upon the patronage of kings, and the Śrāddha rites, and explains, like Somadeva, why Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva cannot be regarded as trustworthy beings (āpta). The author asks in this connection what are the dacoits like, if the great gods be armed with weapons, trident, thunder, discus, bow, mace, lance, sword and club (25. 80)² Similarly, Devasena in Bhāvasaṃgraha (op cit) criticizes bathing in sacred waters, Śrāddha, and adoration of cows, and scoffs at the exploits of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva, who are ridiculed also in Pātraheśaristotra. The Sūtrakṛtāṅga, a canonical work, ridicules ceremonial bathing thus "..... if perfection could be obtained by contact with water, many beings living in water must have reached perfection. fishes, tortoises, aquatic snakes, cormorants, otters, and demons living in water..... If water did wash off the impure Karman, it must take off merit too" Similarly, the morning and evening oblations in the sacred fire are declared to be meaningless "Those who, lighting fire in the morning and evening, contend that perfection is obtained through fire (are easily refuted) For if thereby perfection could be obtained, mechanics also, who use fire, would be liberated (1 7 14-18) ”¹ The same work condemns also the feeding of Brāhmanas (2. 6 43, 44)

In regard to the Jaina attacks on Śrāddha, it is said that the present-day Jainas ‘burn the dead, throw the ashes on the third day into a river, and even offer rice-balls to the crows on the tenth day, and feed relatives and caste-fellows on the twelfth and thirteenth days”² These customs seem to have grown up in later times under Hindu influence. Somadeva, on the other hand, states in Yasastilaka, Book IV, that if the Pitrs have gone to earthly or celestial abodes, they can have no need of annual offerings of rice balls, which are actually eaten by Brāhmanas and crows. His statement may be compared with that of Jātā-Simhanandī in Varāṅgacarita 25 64.

द्विजैश्च काकैर्यदि भुक्तमन्नं मृतान् पितृस्तर्पयते परत्र ।

पुरार्जितं तत् पितृभिर्विनष्टं शुभाशुभं तेन हि कारणेन ॥

The Jaina attack on Śrāddha reminds one of the satire of the Greek writer Lucian (second century A D) on the custom of making offerings to the dead In his Charon, or the Inspectors, Charon the ferryman conveying souls to Hades exclaims ‘What, they eat and drink, when their skulls are dry as tinder? ... I should be in a fine predicament, Hermes, and should have no end of trouble if I were obliged not only to bring them down but to bring them up to drink”³

The group of ‘stupid customs’ mentioned by Somadeva in Yasastilaka VI. 4 and 10 reminds one of those enumerated in Lalitavistara, chap 17, and described as being followed by the misguided adherents of the non-Buddhist sects. Somadeva’s list has been reproduced elsewhere,⁴ that recorded in the Buddhist text is more comprehensive, and where there are resemblances provides additional details Among later Jaina writers Hemacandra enumerates a large number of ‘stupid customs’ followed by diverse non-Jaina communities in his commentary on his Yogasāstra 4. 102, and some of them are undoubtedly mentioned with reference to popular Brahmanism.⁵

Somadeva cites the Smṛti injunction that the Veda and the Dharmasāstras, composed by sages like Manu, Vyāsa and Vasistha, should be regarded as mandatory and authoritative in all matters, and on no account should their authority be called in question by means of argumentation in fact, the Brāhmaṇa, who censures the Veda and despises the Śruti and the Smṛti, should be ostracized as a nāstika. These views are summarily rejected by Somadeva. In Yasastilaka, Book IV, he quotes the relevant verses and calls them fanciful or absurd utterances (mukhabhāsitam). It may be noted that the Buddhist Śāntaraksita also quotes the second verse and makes a similar remark in Tattvasaṃgraha (verses 3584-5)¹ In Yasastilaka VI 2 Somadeva quotes the following verses.

पुराण मानवो धर्मं साङ्गो वेदश्चिकित्सितम् । आज्ञासिद्धानि चत्वारि न हन्तव्यानि हेतुभिः ॥,

श्रुतिं वेदमिह प्रादुर्धर्मशास्त्रं स्मृतिर्मता । ते सर्वार्थेष्वमीमांसे ताभ्यां धर्मो हि निर्वर्तौ ॥

and remarks that the opinion expressed therein is unsound. He points out that a disputant, who depends entirely upon the Scriptures and never resorts to reasoning, while seeking the truth, is not likely to triumph, as the good appreciate merit, but not a thing whose character has not been ascertained. A jewel is placed on the head, but a stone (unobserved while walking) is kicked away with the foot².

The infallibility of the Veda and the Dharmasāstras was the cornerstone of Hindu orthodoxy, and it was natural for non-Brahmanical writers to challenge the theory that the authority of the Śruti and the Smṛti must be unquestioningly accepted. We have already seen that in the controversial dialogue between Yasodhara and his mother in Yasastilaka, Book IV, the latter represents the orthodox view and the former the standpoint of the heretics. Yaśodhara's mother declares to her son: Discard Śruti, Smṛti, Itihāsa, and Purāṇic lore if thou hast no use for thy soul!¹ This is a noteworthy assertion of the Hindu orthodox ideal as it appeared to a Jaina writer of the tenth century

Somadeva's criticism of Hindu beliefs and practices is not without some historical importance, as it shows that the popular Hinduism of the tenth century was not far different from the religion as it exists today. Somadeva justifies his own attitude towards the Brahmanical religion by asserting that no one who speaks out the truth in regard to the Brahmanical deities and other concepts, exercising his own judgment, can be called a slanderer, otherwise the sun, and even the lamp, which reveal things as they are, would be slanderers, too (Book IV)

देवेषु चान्येषु विचारचक्षुर्यथार्थवक्ता किमु निन्दक स्यात् ।

एव न चेत्तर्हि यथार्थदर्शी भानु प्रदीपोऽपि च निन्दक स्यात् ॥

It will be however fair to suppose that the real motive underlying Jaina criticism of Brahmanical tenets and practices was propaganda aimed at showing the latter religion in an unfavourable light, and bringing into relief the relative merits of the Jaina faith. Brahmanical writers do not appear to have taken any serious notice of attacks on their religion by hostile critics, but in Śrīharsa's Nāṣadhacarita (Canto XVII) we find a systematic attempt not only to bring together the different charges levelled against the Brahmanical faith by the Jainas and the Buddhists but to formulate an elaborate reply to them from the orthodox standpoint. The aim of the author of Nāṣadhacarita is to demonstrate the triumph of Hindu orthodoxy over the heretics, while that of Somadeva is to portray its discomfiture in a religious controversy between a tenacious Jaina and a zealous champion of orthodox Brahmanism.

VAISŔAVISM

It is a noteworthy feature of Yasastilaka that, although it discusses or mentions so many philosophical and religious tenets of different schools, it is practically silent upon the Pañcarātra system and Vaisnava doctrine. This is all the more strange, because about the time when Somadeva wrote there was a large mass of Pañcarātra literature extant in Kashmir, as shown by the citations in Utpala's Spandapradīpikā, a commentary on Kallata's Spandakārikā. Utpala wrote in the tenth century,² and quotes in his work Pañcarātrasruti, Pañcarātropanisad, and the three wellknown Samhitās Jayā, Sātvatā and Paushkarā. He quotes also the Viṣṇuāmalā and two texts called Samkarsanasūtras and Jābālsūtras, which, to judge from the citations, are clearly works dealing with Vaisnava doctrine¹. It would seem that while works dealing with Pāñcāīātra or Vaisnava doctrines were widely prevalent in Kashmir in the tenth century, they had not so far become current in the Deccan, otherwise it would be difficult to explain the absence of any reference to Pāñcāīātra tenets in so encyclopaedic a writer as the author of Yasastilaka.

1 'श्रुतिस्मृतीहासपुराणवाचस्यजात्मना चेन्न तवास्ति कार्यम् ॥'

The Bhāgavatas are casually mentioned by Somadeva in a simile in Yasastilaka, Book I, and spoken of as resorting to Kṛṣṇabhūmi, explained in the commentary as referring to Dvāīakā². Another reference occurs towards the end of Book V, wherein Āsuri, one of the interlocutors of the sage Sudatta, in the episode of Candakarman, is described as a Bhāgavata; but in the discussion that follows he figures as an exponent of Sāṃkhya views. The silence of Somadeva on Vaisnava doctrine seems to be an indication that Vaisnavism was not a force to reckon with in the Deccan in the tenth century, and, in any case, it does not evoke any criticism in his work.

Certain characteristics of Viṣṇu are, it is true, criticized in Yasastilaka. Somadeva, for instance, criticizes the belief in the Incarnations of Viṣṇu, of which he gives the number as ten³. He refers also to Rādhā's relations with Nārāyaṇa,⁴ and Kṛṣṇa's love for the cowherd maids⁵. But, on the whole, the deity appears in his work rather as a mythological character than as the central figure of a religious system. A passing reference to the idea that the universe is pervaded by Viṣṇu occurs in a description of evening scenery, in Book IV⁶.

The paucity of references to the cult of Viṣṇu, as contrasted with the prominence given to that of Śiva, in Somadeva's work, seems to suggest that, while Vaisnavism existed during the period of the Rāstrakūtas, it was Śaivism that wielded the greater influence, and formed the principal target of Jaina attacks. It is, however, necessary to go back much earlier to obtain a correct perspective of the relative position of the Vaisnava and Śaiva faiths in the Deccan. The early Calukyas were mostly, if not all, followers of the Vaisnava cult. The Vaisnava cave at Badami was excavated in 578 A. D. under Kīrtivarma I. In it was installed the image of Viṣṇu and provision made for nārāyaṇabali or offering to Nārāyaṇa¹ Still more significant is the fact that most of the early and archaic-looking temples at Aihole, in the south-eastern portion of the Bijapur district, were originally dedicated to Viṣṇu, the usual cognizance being the figure of Garuda upon the dedicatory block over the shrine door² The earliest of these temples are that of Lād Khān and the Kontgudi group, ascribed to the beginning of the sixth century A. D. The temple of Lād Khān³ is square in plan and remarkable for its cave-like characteristics the flat roof, and its want of elevation, the great massiveness of the pillars unusual in structural temples and the total absence of anything like a śikhara or tower, except for a small square shrine over the central portion of the roof The temple has great lattice windows, beautifully finished, in the north and south sides, 'but the most decorated part of the temple is the front porch, the pillars of which have life-sized images upon them in bold relief'. The Kont-gudi temple is of the same type as the last, and, like it, square in plan It is smaller in size, 'but, except for the pillars, it is hardly less massive in construction'. 'The roof in them idle, above the four pillars, is flat, and it slopes away from this square space, all around, to the four walls' Upon the flat central portion of the roof is the first storey of an unfinished tower, with an image niche on each of its four sides That on the west contains an image of the Varāha avatāra of Viṣṇu, while, on the east, is the Vāmana avatāra. By the side of Kont-gudi is another early temple, of an unusual type. The edifice is, in plan, more like an early Muhammadan mosque than a Hindu temple, being in the form of a long open verandah, with three rows of columns in its depth 'The shrine is just where the Mihirāb would have been, being formed by enclosing the space between the central pair of back pillars and the back walls, the doorway being between the pillars'. The pillars are of the same type as those at Lād Khān's and upon the front of one of the pillars is an image of Narasimha Close to this temple is another of the same class, 'built upon the same open verandah plan', somewhat smaller in size

One of the most remarkable buildings at Aihole is that known as the Durga temple, which, in plan, closely resembles the Buddhist Caitya caves As in these cathedral caves, the end of the temple is round or apsidal, and it has a central nave and two side aisles separated by two rows of columns. The central roof is flat and lofty, and that of the side aisles low and sloping. Perhaps the most conspicuous feature is the pillared verandah, outside, surrounding the temple, and projecting in front to form an open pillared hall, or porch. Gaiuda presiding above the shrine door shows that the temple was dedicated to Visnu.

A characteristic common to the temples mentioned above is that the shrine is not a separate compartment from the hall, as is usual in Brahmanical temples, but is formed within the hall itself by enclosing the required space between one of the walls and the nearest pillars. In the cartya-like Durga temple, the shrine is in the place where the dagoba would be. Even apart from the peculiar shrine, these early temples have many unusual characteristics and stand in a class by themselves, both as regards age and style. In addition to them, there are certain other temples at Aihole, also dedicated to Visnu, which are considered to be earlier than the seventh century A. D., judging by the general style and 'more cyclopean-looking masonry'.

It will be thus seen that Vaisnavism came to be associated with a very early type of architecture at Aihole, which must have been an important centre of the Visnu cult during the sixth and seventh centuries A. D. But towards the beginning of the eighth century, the centre of gravity shifts to Pattadakal, where we find massive temples being erected in honour of Śiva, and what looks like a change over to Śaivism takes place. Certain old shrines, for example, the Mālegitti-Śivalāya, which were originally dedicated to Visnu, seem to have been converted to Śaiva worship at a later date¹. On a pillar in the Durga temple at Aihole is a short inscription in letters of the 8th or 9th century, which reads "Śrī-Basa-mayya, the bhatta of Kisuvalal". Pattada Kisuvalal is the ancient name of Pattadakal, and the presence of the bhatta from that centre of Śaivism 'may be connected with the time when these temples were restored for Śaiva worship'². There is another factor pointing to such conversion of Visnu temples to Śaiva worship. A circular panel of carving representing the tāṇḍava dance of Śiva is found, for example, on the front of most of the old temples at Aihole. But the slab often lies loosely against the tower instead of being built in with it, and in the earliest temples the sculpture is of inferior quality compared with that on the other parts. It is probable that the slab bearing representation of the tāṇḍava is a later addition made when the temples were first converted to Śaiva worship³.

3 Cousens (op cit), p. 40

Vaisnavism appears to have been a secondary cult under the Rāstrakūtas. The great cave temples at Ellora were, with a few exceptions, excavated for the worship of Śiva, if we exclude the Buddhist and Jaina caves. The two-storied Daśāvatāra cave is no doubt an exception, and contains sculptures representing Viṣṇu resting on Śeṣa, Viṣṇu, six-armed, holding up the Govardhana hill, and the Varāha, Vāmana and Nārasimha incarnations. The shrine was excavated about the middle of the eighth century A. D. in the reign of the Rāstrakūta king Dantadurga, whose triumphs are recorded in an inscription upon the cave¹. But Śaiva sculpture preponderates even in the Daśāvatāra cave. Some of them illustrate the Bhairava aspect of Śiva², and there is another of particular interest, designed to prove the superiority of Śiva to Brahmā and Viṣṇu who fail to discover the top and the base respectively of the great *liṅga*³. There is another Vaisnava cave at Ellora (No XXVII), known as the Milkmaid's cave, 'but the style of it says but little for the wealth or influence of the sect in the days when it was executed'⁴.

As already stated, if temple architecture is any index to the influence and popularity of a religion, Śaivism was the more important faith during the rule of the Cālukyas of Kalyāṇi. There exist a comparatively few examples of later Cālukyan temples dedicated to Viṣṇu. Vikramāditya VI constructed a large temple of Viṣṇu, and had a tank dug in front of it⁵. An inscription slab, in the court-yard of the temple of Dakṣiṇa-Kedāreśvara, records a grant, in 1075 A. D., of a village to the Vaisnava temple of Nārasimha at Baligāve, or Balagāmve, now a small village in Mysore territory, fourteen miles south-west of Hira-Keṭūr in the Dharwar district⁶. The Basti or Kalla-Gudi at Degāmve, about twenty-five miles south-east from Belgaum, is a decorated medieval temple consisting of 'a long pillared hall in front of three shrines on the west side, the middle one projecting forward into the hall in advance of the other two'. The central shrine contains an image of Lakṣmī Nārāyaṇa. An inscription in the temple records the building of the shrines of Kamalānārāyaṇa and Mahālakṣmī, while another records a grant by Kamalādevī, queen of the Kādamba chief of Goa, to Brāhmanas of the village of Degāmve, in 1175 A. angles to the temple of Siddheśvara at Hāveri, in the Dharwar district, is a smaller Vaisnava temple dedicated to Nārasimha, a large image of the deity being found in the shrine. Mahādeva, the general of Vikramāditya VI, who built the great Śiva temple at Ittagi towards the end of the eleventh century, built also the temple of Nārāyana, which might be identified with the smaller temple, built in granite, upon the south side of the main temple 'It occupies very much the same position with regard to the main temple as the Vaisnava shrine of Nārasimha does to the temple of Siddheśvara at Hāveri'

Of the later Cālukyan temples in the Bellary district of Madras Presidency, there appear to be few that are dedicated to Viṣṇu. Notable exceptions are the temple of Venugopālasvāmin at Māgalā and that of Keśavasvāmin at Huvinahadgalli.¹

It is apparent, on the whole, that more elaborate provision seems to have been made for the organised worship of Śiva than for the cult of Viṣṇu under the ruling dynasties of the Deccan. There is also the important fact that, in the history of the Deccan, during seven centuries, Vaisnavism has nothing so imposing and grand to show as the temple of Virūpākṣa at Pattadakal or Kailāsa at Ellora or Mahādeva at Ittagi.

The situation is not far different in the northern part of the Deccan where, architecturally, the most important temples are the great shrine of Śiva at Ambaranātha, built in the eleventh century A. D. The temple of Lakṣmī-Nārāyana at Pedgaon, near Srīgunda in the Ahmadnagar district, is 'a perfect little gem', but its date is not known.² Far more important for the religious history of the Deccan is the celebrated Vaisnava temple of Vithobā, or Vitthala, at Pandharpur in the Sholapur district, on the banks of the Bhīmā. The present temple is of little interest from an architectural point of view, but there is no doubt that it succeeded an older one to the same deity, as an inscription upon a plaster of a former temple, now used as an overhead beam in the present, informs us that the Hoysala king Vīra-Someśvara presented a gift of gold to the god Vitthala in Samvat 1159 (1237 A. D.).³ Vithobā is perhaps the most popular deity in the Deccan, but the temple dedicated to him is not known to have existed before the thirteenth century. The cult itself must have existed before this, and probably goes back to a much earlier date, but it is difficult to determine its extent and influence during the period under consideration.

While speaking of the relative position of Vaisnavism and Śaivism in the Deccan, it is necessary to point out that there appears to have been no sharp division between the two cults in those early days. On the other hand, a certain amount of syncretism is apparent in the religious thought of the time. The popularity of the conception of trimūrti is an illustration of this. An inscription of the reign of the Cālukya king Vijayāditya says that images of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara were installed in Vātāpūra (Badami) in the third year of his reign, that is, in 699 A. D. The images of these three deities occur also in the panels of the ceilings of several of the oldest temples at Aihole. For example, in the temple beside that of Kont-gudi, there are finely carved images of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva in each of the three central bays of the ceiling, Śiva being placed in the centre¹. There was a temple at Salotgi in the Bijapur district, in the 10th century, for the joint worship of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva². No less significant is the impartial mixture of Śaiva and Vaisnava sculptures in the early temples of the Deccan. For example, on the exterior walls of the temple of Pāpanātha at Pattadakal, there are images of Śiva in various attitudes, Viṣṇu, Mahisāsura-mardini, Ganapati, Narasimha, Varāha, the Vāmana avatāra, and Kṛṣṇa, upholding the Govardhana hill. Among the sculptures on the walls of the temple of Virūpākṣa, are found Ardhanārī, the Vāmana avatāra and Viṣṇu upon the east face of the edifice, Śiva and Pārvatī, the tāṇḍava of Śiva, Harihara, Bhairava and Varāha on the north side, Śiva and Viṣṇu in various forms on the west wall, and Lakulīśa, Śiva in different forms, Viṣṇu and Narasimha among those on the south wall. Similarly, there is 'an impartial mixture of Śaiva and Vaisnava subjects in the image groups, representing Narasimha, Mahisāsura-mardini, Varāha, Viṣṇu, Ardhanārī and Śiva, in the niches around the walls in the outer verandah of the Durga temple at Aihole. Among the sculptures on the pillars in the Śaiva temple of Mallikāṛjuna or Trailokyēśvara at Pattadakal are depicted scenes from the life of Kṛṣṇa. He is seen, for example, killing Kamsa's great elephant, then the demon Keśin who is in the shape of a horse, and, at the end, Aṣṭa who attacked him in the shape of a savage bull.'³

It will be seen that, among the incarnations of Viṣṇu, Varāha, Vāmana and Narasiṃha are the most frequent in the sculptural representations of that deity in the early temples of the Deccan. At Ellora, as in the Daśavatāra cave, they are found also in the Kailāsa temple, in the corridor surrounding the back half of the court.¹ The ten incarnations of Viṣṇu are found sculptured on a huge rock at Badami, close behind the Bhūtanātha group of temples. Upon the south side of this rock is a sculpture of Nārāyaṇa reclining upon Śeṣa, with the ten avatāras in a row above him, some on one side and some on the other side of Brahmā.² The sculpture in question is no doubt much earlier than the reference to the ten avatāras in Somadeva's Yasastilaka. The number of the avatāras came, as a matter of fact, to be fixed at ten long before the tenth century A. D. A verse inscription in Pallava-Grantha characters of about the eighth century A. D., found in the rock-cut temple of Varāha-Perumāl at Mahābalipuram, enumerates the ten incarnations as follows the Fish, the Tortoise, the Boar, the Man-Lion, the Dwarf, Rāma, Rāma (Paraśurāma), Rāma (Balarāma), Buddha and Kalki.³ The reference to the ten avatāras in Somadeva's work is, however, of some importance as showing that they were well-known, and probably worshipped, in the Deccan in the tenth century. The image of Nārāyaṇa with the ten avatāras, on the rock at Badami, is still worshipped, and a small shrine has been built for the purpose in front of the rock.⁴

The close contiguity of Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava shrines at Hāveri, and probably also at Ittagi, is an indication of the harmonious co-existence of the two cults. Interesting examples of Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava shrines standing in close juxtaposition to one another have been found in Mysore State, at Marale in the Chikmangalur Taluk, and at Mosale, a village about eight miles to the south of Hassan. The twin temples at Mosale are ornate structures standing side by side, a few feet apart, and belong to the Hoysala style of architecture. They are identical in size and workmanship, and have been assigned, on architectural grounds, to the twelfth century A. D., when most of the ornate temples in Mysore State came into being. One of the shrines is dedicated to Śiva styled as Nāgeśvara, while the other contains a Viṣṇu image called Channakeśava.⁵

As Purāṇic deities, Śiva and Viṣṇu were equally revered in the Deccan, as elsewhere, a trend reflected in sculpture as well as literature. Among the few non-Jaina writers of the Rāstrakūta period, Trivikrama Bhatta, the author of Nalacampū, who lived in the early years of the tenth century, under India III, was a staunch adherent of the Śaiva faith. The work is described in the colophons as 'imprinted with the lotus feet of Śiva', and the concluding verse of each chapter contains a phrase expressive of devotion to Śiva. The sixth chapter of Nalacampū contains, however, a fervent hymn to Viṣṇu, and this also reminds us of the fact that the opening verse of Rāstrakūta grants offers salutation to Viṣṇu as well as Śiva. Devotion to both the deities was part of the religious syncretism of the time, and shows the popularity and ascendancy of the Purāṇic religion as a whole. But the evidence furnished by architecture and literary sources shows that, as an organised cult, Vaiṣṇavism occupied a subsidiary position in the Deccan, and seems to have prevailed there in the shadow of Śaivism for several centuries, say, from the eighth to the twelfth. The Vaiṣṇava cult was hardly a rival of Jainism in the Deccan; and we find, accordingly, Jaina attacks levelled chiefly against Śaivism, which was its greatest rival even before the rise of the Lingāyats.

BUDDHISTS AND OTHER SECTS

The Jainas had nothing but contempt for those communities who had no objection to taking flesh and wine. In Yasastilaka VI 10 the Veda and the Buddhist and the Śaiva scriptures are described as favouring the use of honey, flesh and wine.¹ The Buddhists are particularly decried for not observing any restrictions in regard to food and drink. In Yasastilaka VI, 2 Somadeva asks: How can the wise respect the Buddhist who is addicted to flesh and wine?²

In another verse the Buddhist appears to be described as a votary of what is called advanta pure and simple. Somadeva seems to say that, excepting the Jaina doctrine, all other systems favour either 'the path of duality' (dvanta) or 'that of non-duality' (advanta), and he illustrates his remarks by saying that the Mantrin or the Śaiva mystic follows the Vāmamārga and the Dakṣinamārga, and the Brahmanical Scriptures lay stress on Karma and Jñāna, while those of the Buddhists merely prescribe flesh-eating.¹ In Yasastilaka VII. 24 the Buddhists are mentioned first among certain communities who recommend the eating of flesh.²

The quarrel of the Jamas and the Buddhists over the question of using flesh as an article of food goes back to very early times. "In the time of Buddha there was in Vaiśālī a wealthy general named Siha who was a convert to Buddhism. He became a liberal supporter of the Brethren and kept them constantly supplied with good flesh food. When it was noised abroad that the bhikshus were in the habit of eating such food specially provided for them the Tīrthikas made the practice a matter of angry reproach." The Master thereupon announced to the Brethren "the law that they were not to eat the flesh of any animal which they had seen put to death for them, or about which they had been told that it had been killed for them, or about which they had reason to suspect that it had been slain for them. But he permitted to the Brethren as 'pure' (that is, lawful) food the flesh of animals the slaughter of which had not been seen by the bhikshus, not heard of by them, and not suspected by them to have been on their account. In the Pālī and Ssu-fen Vinaya it was after a breakfast given by Siha to the Buddha and some of the Brethren, for which the carcass of a large ox was procured, that the Nirgranthas reviled the bhikshus and Buddha instituted this new rule declaring fish and flesh pure in the three conditions. The animal food now permitted to the bhikshus ... was tersely described as 'unseen, unheard, unsuspected' Two more kinds of animal food were later "declared lawful for the Brethren, viz the flesh of animals which had died a natural death, and that of animals which had been killed by a bird of prey or other savage creature"³ This was the Hīnayānist position

- 3 Watters On Yuan Chwang's Travels in India 629-645 A D, Vol I, p 55. Manichaeism, which prohibited the slaughter of animals, permitted the Hearers, as distinguished from the Elect, to eat flesh food when it had been slain by others. Cf Wand A History of the Early Church, p 141. The Manichaean Elect and Hearers corresponded pretty well to monks and seculars. Babylon was the birth-place of Manichaeism, and Manes, the founder of the new religion about the middle of the third century, was brought up in the sect of the Mugthasila, who laid special stress on abstinence from flesh, wine and women. Kidd A History of the Church, Vol I, p 506.

in regard to the use of flesh as an article of food. The Mahāyānist rule, on the other hand, prohibited "the use of flesh of any kind as food by the 'sons of Buddha'", and "some Mahāyānists were strict in abstaining, not only from all kinds of flesh food, but also from milk and its products"¹ In Yuan Chwang's time, for instance, there were three Buddhist monasteries in Karnasuvarna (in Bengal) "in which in accordance with the teaching of Devadatta milk products were not taken as food"² So far as Jaina criticism is concerned, the writers do not make any distinction between Hīnayānists and Mahāyānists and condemn the Buddhists as a class for partaking of animal food. That there was considerable laxity in matters of food and drink among the Buddhists in the tenth century and thereabouts seems extremely probable, and charges of soft living were in fact occasionally levelled against them. Devasena, who wrote about twentyfive years earlier than Somadeva, severely criticizes Buddhist doctrine, in his Bhāvasamgraha, and remarks that the Buddhist regards whatever falls into his begging bowl as pure, eats flesh and shamelessly drinks wine, but if it were possible to go to heaven by eating flesh and drinking wine, it is the drunkards and the huntsmen that would go thither³ Similarly, Udayana, who wrote a few decades after Somadeva, says that the absence of any restrictions in the matter of food and drink, eating at all hours of the day, and lightness of religious duties are among the causes that induce men to become Buddhists.⁴ Hemacandra says in his commentary on his Yogasāstra 4 102 that the practice of austerities is impossible for the Buddhists who eat day and night, and make no distinction between lawful and forbidden food. Further, he remarks in an interesting verse that the religion of the Buddha is excellent indeed, its essentials being a soft bed, rice-gruel in the morning, boiled rice at noon, drinking bouts in the evening, and sugarcandy at night.⁵ The Buddhists, on the whole, gave offence to the Jainas by their indulgence in food and drink which the latter abhorred.

In Yasastilaka VIII 43 Somadeva advises his co-religionists to have nothing to do with the Buddhists, the Nāstikas, the Adepts in sacrifices, the Jātilas (that is, the Śaivas) and the Ājīvakas.⁶ There is no doubt that a certain amount of communal hatred existed between the Jainas and the Buddhists, and mutual recriminations are occasionally found in the religious literature of both the communities. The Jainas contended that since the Buddhists denied the existence of the Self, all their talk of compassion and philanthropy was meaningless. The Buddha is accordingly called 'ferocious and merciless' (1) in Jātāsīmhanandī's Varāṅgacarita 25 84¹. On similar grounds Akalanka accuses the Buddha of criminal propensities such as injury to others, falsehood, theft and unchastity².

The Buddhists are likewise in the habit of giving expression to their contempt for the Jainas and their habits and customs. The celebrated Mahāyāna work Saddharma-puṇḍarīka (earlier than the third century) says, for instance, that the Bodhisattva 'must avoid such monks as follow the precepts of the Aṇiśat, and immoral men (chap. XIII)'.³

The practice of nudity (nagnabhāva) mentioned in the Lalitavistara (chap. XVII) among the stupid customs followed by the adherents of the non-Buddhist systems obviously refers to the Digambara monks. In the first half of the seventh century, the great Chinese traveller Hsuan-tsang (the name is variously spelt), a philosopher of Mahāyāna Buddhism, ridicules Jainism as a sort of caricature of the Buddhist religion. "These sectarians", writes Hsuan-tsang, "give themselves up to extreme austerities. Day and night they display the most ardent zeal without a moment's respite. The law expounded by their founder (Mahāvīra) has been largely stolen from the books of Buddha, and on this he guided himself when laying down his precepts and rules. In their religious observances and exercises, they follow almost entirely the rule of the Buddhist monks..... The statue of their teacher, by a kind of impertinent imitation, resembles that of Buddha." Here is a picture of the Digambara monks drawn by the Chinese pilgrim: "The Jainas think they gain distinction by leaving their bodies entirely naked, and they make a virtue of tearing out their hair. Their skin is all broken, and their feet are horny and cracked, they are like those rotten trees that are found close to a river."⁴ In similar but less dignified language, certain Digambara practices are held up to ridicule in the Dohākosa of Sarojavajra (Saraha) written in an Apabhramśa dialect sometime between the eighth and twelfth centuries.⁵ Saraha, who was a Buddhist Tantric writer, says that if it were possible to attain salvation by going about naked, the dogs and the jackals would surely attain it. As regards the practice of plucking out the hair, he says something positively indecent. Then he says that if the carrying of peacock's feathers led to salvation, the horses and the elephants who are decorated with them were bound to obtain it!¹ Recriminations of this type point to theological hatred, but there is no reason to suppose that there was any deep-seated hostility between the Jainas and the Buddhists. As pointed out by S. C. Vidyabhusan, 'there was no bitter rivalry' between the two communities. According to the same scholar, the Jaina writers Rabhasa Nandi (circa 850 A. D.) and Kalyānacandra (about 1000 A. D.) appear to have written commentaries on the Buddhist logician Dharmakīrti's Sambandha-parīkṣā and Pramāṇa-vārtika respectively, while the Jaina Mallavādin (about 962 A. D.) wrote a commentary on Nyāya-bindu-ṭīkā of Dharmottara.²

The Ājīvakas whom Somadeva mentions among the communities to be shunned by the Jainas were an ancient sect founded by Mankhaliputra Gośālaka, a contemporary of Mahāvīra, and the present reference to them shows that members of this sect were still to be found in the tenth century. The Jainas disliked the Ājīvakas, as their founder Gośālaka was a bitter rival and opponent of Mahāvīra, and the former is, as a matter of fact, represented as something of an impostor in early Jaina literature.³ Nor were the Ājīvakas liked by the Buddhists. Just as Somadeva asks the Jainas to keep aloof from Ājīvakas, Buddhists, Nāstikas and others, similarly the Saddharma-puṇḍarīka (Chap. XIII) declares that the Bodhisattva never associates with Carakas, Parivrajakas, Ājīvakas and Nirgranthas (Jainas).⁴ The Ājīvakas had certain peculiar doctrines, e.g. the Niyativāda, an extreme form of fatalism propounded by Gośālaka, and seem to have flourished in South India for centuries after the age of Mahāvīra, as their doctrines are included among the contemporary philosophical systems described in detail in the Tamil epic Mamimekhalan, assigned to the early centuries of the Christian era. In another Tamil epic of the same age, the Ṣilappadikāram, the father of the heroine Kannaki is said to have distributed his wealth among the Ājīvaka friars. "This is a very important ference inasmuch as the religion of the Ājīvakas, if it could be so described, as undoubtedly practised in South India at the time".¹ It should be noted this connection that Somadeva, contrary to his usual practice, does not mention any doctrines of the sect so that we cannot tell how far any well-defined Ājīvaka system prevailed in his time. All that the reference to the jīvaks in Yasastilaka proves is the existence of the sect in the tenth century.

In Yasastilaka VII 24 Somadeva seems to refer to another sect, though it is not explicitly mentioned. He says that such is the peculiarity of things that the cow's milk is pure but not the flesh, just as the gem supposed to be on the hood of a snake counteracts poison, while snake-poison self causes death. Again, milk may be taken, but not the cow's flesh; just as the leaves of a poisonous plant may be taken for the cure of disease, while its roots are sure to cause death.² Somadeva seems here to reply to an argument that if it was permissible to take milk there was no reason why one should not take beef. Exactly this opinion is put in the mouth of the leader of the Rahamāna sect in the Jaina allegorical play Moharāja-Parājanya written about two centuries later, wherein he declares that just as one takes cow's milk, similarly one may take also cow's flesh without incurring sin. Rahamāna says further that according to Dhamka, Dharmma consists in the killing of Brāhmana ascetics.³ We do not know anything about this Rahamāna who appears in the play along with the Kaula and the Kāpālīka, but the views attributed to him might very well represent those of the Muslims. It is not clear whether Somadeva had in mind the views of any particular sect or community while making the statements cited above, but it was not impossible for him to have been acquainted with Muslim customs, since the contact between Indian and Muslim cultures goes back to a date at least two centuries earlier than the composition of his Yasastilaka.

The conflict of religions in the Deccan in the tenth century should not blind us to the general spirit of toleration prevailing in the age. Much important evidence has been adduced by scholars to prove the existence of concord and harmony in the sphere of religion, and we have referred elsewhere⁴ to isolated attempts at a synthesis of divergent philosophical and religious views in the century.

CHAPTER XIV

JAINA CRITICISM OF VEDIC SACRIFICES

Apart from the criticism of popular Hinduism, Somadeva denounces the Vedic sacrificial system for sanctioning animal slaughter in the controversial dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother in Yaśastilaka, Book IV. As examples of Vedic rites involving the killing of animals he mentions Rājasūya, Vājapeya, Gosava, Aśvamedha, Kārīrī and Pundarika (in which an elephant is said to have been sacrificed),¹ and condemns also the Sautrāmanī sacrifice in which it was customary to drink wine.² Vedic sacrifices are represented as sinful also in Buddhist texts, for example, in the Mahāvastu (Vol II, p 237) wherein Māra instigates the Bodhisattva to perform certain sacrifices for the attainment of heaven and religious merit, viz Aśvamedha, Purusamedha, Somaprāsa, Nirargada (?), Paduma and Pundarika.³ References like these are of a literary character and do not always point to contemporary conditions. In any case Somadeva's criticism of Vedic sacrifices and citations from sacrificial texts do not prove that Vedic rites were common in his time, as Vedic sacrifices seem to have gone out of vogue and become obsolete by the tenth century. The Smārta religion reigned supreme, and it has been pointed out, for instance, that there are only two Rāstrakūta inscriptions which record grants made to enable Brāhmanas to perform Vedic sacrifices like Rājasūya, Vājapeya and Agnistoma. "In all other cases the grants were made for discharging purely Smārta duties connected with bali, caru, varsvadeva." Further, "Alberuni was informed that the Vedic sacrifices were rarely performed and practically abandoned because they presupposed a long life...".⁴ It may be added that the decline of Vedic sacrifices must have set in long before the tenth century or even the Rāstrakūta period. Śamkara in his Bhāṣya on the Vedānta Sūtras 3. 1. 25, indeed, speaks of Vedic rites as if they were still being performed by cultured people in his time.⁵ But it is important to note that the Prasastapāda Bhāṣya, which belongs to the early centuries of the Christian era, while laying down the religious duties of a householder in connection with the Vaiśeṣika scheme of spiritual discipline, prescribes in the first instance Smārta rites such as the five Mahāyajñas and the Pākayajñas, and then mentions the Śrauta sacrifices the Haviryajñas (Agnīādheya, Darsapauṇamāsa etc.) and the Somayajñas (Agnistoma, Ukthya etc.), to be undertaken *if one has the capacity to do so*¹ Udayana who wrote in the last quarter of the tenth century says in his Nyāyakusumāñjali, chap. 2, that Vedic rites such as Rājasūya and Aśvamedha were dying out in his time, as they were no longer performed, and that in his age Dharmā rested only on one foot, charity, owing to the decline of the Vedic sacrifices² The Nyāya theory of sāṅkoccheda, the dying out of the Vedic schools, was, in fact, more in conformity with the process of history than the Mīmāṃsā view which refused to believe in any such decay

It may, however, be readily admitted that Vedic sacrifices continued to be sporadically performed till quite recent times, and contemporary evidence of the performance of such rites is not rare. The Aśvamedha, in particular, attracted many kings of the ruling dynasties. For example, the Ikṣvāku king Vāsisthīputra Cāntamūla I, who reigned in the Andhra country about the second quarter of the third century A. D., is said to have performed the Aśvamedha and Vājapeya sacrifices.³ Several inscriptions of the Vākātaka kings, who ruled in Central Provinces and Berar, state that Pravarasena I who reigned about the end of the third century A. D. performed four Aśvamedhas besides several other Vedic sacrifices such as Agnistoma, Āptoryāma, Ukthya, Śodaśin, Atirātra, Vājapeya, Brhaspatisava and Sādyaskra. The inscriptions of the Vākātakas frequently mention their kinsmen, the Bhārasivas, who seem to have established themselves on the banks of the Ganges, and are said to have celebrated as many as ten Aśvamedhas⁴ In Gupta records Samudragupta (c. 330-375 A. D.) is stated to have revived the Aśvamedha which had long been in abeyance, evidently in North India, for it seems to have been quite popular in the South. The Pallava king Śivaskandavarman, who has been assigned to about the beginning of the fourth century A. D., is reported to have performed the Agnistoma, Vājapeya and Aśvamedha sacrifices⁵ Dahrasena, the Traikūṭaka king of Northern Deccan, who ruled in the second half of the fifth century, and the Kadamba king Kṛṣṇavarman I, who ruled in West Mysore and Kanara about the end of the fifth century A. D., are also credited with the performance of the Aśvamedha¹ In the sixth century A. D. the Cālukya Pulakeśi I is mentioned as having performed a great many sacrifices including the Aśvamedha² A much later instance is that of the Cola king Rājādhirāja I, who is known to have performed the Aśvamedha about the middle of the eleventh century³ The Yādava king Kṛṣṇa (1247-1260 A. D.) is said to have performed a great many sacrifices and 'brought fresh strength to the Vedic ceremonial religion which in the course of time had lost its hold over the people'⁴ Cāndūpandita, the author of a learned commentary on Śrīharsa's Narsadhacarita, performed a large number of important sacrifices, showing that Vedic ritual was not extinct in Gujarat in the last quarter of the thirteenth century.⁵ The Vājapeya was performed in the sixteenth century for the Vijayanagara kings Nṛsiṃha and Kṛṣṇa-Rāya⁶ The Aśvamedha was performed by Sevai Jayasing of Amber as late as the first half of the eighteenth century.⁷

Somadeva while condemning animal slaughter for religious purposes combats the theory that killing in Vedic sacrifices is not, properly speaking, killing, as it ensures to the victim life in heaven⁸ The subject is more systematically dealt with by Mallisena (1292 A. D.) in his Syādvādamāñjari (under verse 11) He tries to show that the killing of animals even for the purpose of Vedic sacrifices is a grievous sin, and quotes in support of his thesis the views of certain Brahmanical thinkers, Sāṃkhyas and Vedāntins and Vyāsa, who abhorred the practice of animal slaughter in Vedic ritual

The views of Vyāsa are quoted also by Somadeva, and it is interesting to find Jaina writers drawing on Brahmanical sources to reinforce the doctrine of ahimsā (Yasastilaka, Book IV)

Somadeva's views on the killing of animals in Vedic sacrifices are recorded in the aforesaid dialogue between Yaśodhara and his mother. Mallisena sums up by saying that just as a cruel man may try to obtain a kingdom by killing his own son, but cannot escape the ignominy and sin resulting therefrom, even if he attains his object, similarly, even though the gods may be gratified by the slaughter of animals sanctioned by the Veda, the sin caused by such killing can never be averted.¹

The attacks on the authority of the Veda and its religion which we come across in Yasastilaka belong to a class of recriminatory literature directed against Vedic rites by Jaina writers since long before the tenth century. Although the Vedic religion had been obsolete for centuries, it was considered worth while to attack the Veda, since it was the bed-rock on which the superstructure of Brahmanism was claimed to have been built up beyond the ravages of time. Among the many stories invented for the purpose of discrediting the Vedic religion, there are at least three which deserve notice as illustrating the Jaina attitude and mentality in regard to the Brahmanical Scriptures. The earlier version of the story of Sagara, Sulasā, Nārada, Parvata and Vasu related in Jinasena I's Harivamsapurāṇa (cantos 17 and 23) and Somadeva's Yasastilaka, Book VII, occurs in the comprehensive Jaina Prākṛit romance Vasudevahindī, Chap V (circa sixth century A D). This story is interesting as recording the Jaina allegation that the Veda and its religion were the work of a demon named Kālāsura. The latter is also called Mahākāla, e. g. in Vasudevahindī wherein he is described as a most reprobate god, the minister of Yama.² Even a sober philosophical writer like Vidyānandī declares in his Tattvārthaslokavārtika 1. 20. 36 that the followers of Kanāda attribute the authorship of the Veda to Brahman, while the Jainas attribute it to Kālāsura. Similarly, in an outrageous story preserved in Vasudevahindī (Chap III), Pippalāda, the reputed author of the Atharvaveda, is described as being born of the illicit union of the nun Sulasā and the ascetic Jannavakka. He is deserted by his parents as soon as he is born, but grows up to be an eminent Vedic scholar. In the course of time he comes to know the circumstances of his birth, and invents the Atharvaveda and its black magic in order to take revenge upon his parents. He severs the tongue of his father with a knife, and after reminding him of the crime of desertion of his own child, hacks him to pieces and offers the limbs as oblations in the sacrificial fire. A similar treatment is meted out to his mother. This is the Jaina version of the origin of the magic rites of the Atharvaveda. Another interesting but far from disgusting story about Vedic rites occurs in the eleventh canto of Ravisena's Padmacarita (seventh century A. D.), which contains also a slightly different version of the Parvata story. The story in question describes the destruction of Marutta's sacrifice by Ravana, represented as a patron of Jainism in Ravisena's work, which contains a Jaina version of the story of the Rāmāyana. The Jaina sage Nārada argues with the officiating priest about the authority of the Veda and the advisability of performing sacrifices, and tries to convince him of the sinful character of animal slaughter. Some of his sentiments are not unlike those expressed by Yaśodhara in Yasastilaka, the following two verses, the first from Yasastilaka, Book IV and the second from Padmacarita 247, may be compared.

शुक्रशोणितसंभूतमशुचीना निकेतनम् । मांसं चेत् प्रीणयेद्देवानेत व्याघ्राणुपासहे ॥

शुक्रशोणितसंभूतममेध्यकृमिसंभवम् । दुर्गन्धदर्शनं मांसं भक्षयन्ति कथं सुराः ॥

The assembled Brāhmanas are enraged at the interference of Nārada, and attack him with kicks and blows. The news is brought to Ravana who hastens to the sacrificial site with his soldiers, and there follows a tumultuous scene in which the animals kept for the sacrifice are set free and sacrificial posts broken, and the Brāhmanas receive a good hammering. The description of the Brāhmanas as "huntsmen with the sacred thread round their necks" sums up the Jaina attitude towards the Vedic religion.

Considering the theological hatred of earlier times, it is not surprising to find Jaina writers inventing or giving currency to stories calculated to discredit the Vedic religion and culture. The Jainas had, however, no direct knowledge of Vedic literature, and their criticism of Vedic rites is often disfigured by gross exaggerations, misunderstanding and misstatements. A few examples may be given to show that even a deeply learned scholar like Somadeva is not wholly free from this charge.

In Yasastilaka, Book IV, Somadeva quotes a Vedic phrase ब्रह्मणे ब्राह्मणसालमेत, and opines that the Veda sanctions the killing of a Brāhmana in spite of the general injunction that a Brāhmana should not be killed¹ We are not here concerned with the question of whether traces of human sacrifice are found in the Vedic age, but the phrase cited by Somadeva belongs to the ritual of the Purusamedha which is wrongly supposed by him to be a human sacrifice. The Purusamedha was a symbolic rite, and the human victims, men as well as women, who were actually tied to the sacrificial posts, were set free, one and all, after the paryagnikarana or carrying of a firebrand round the victims. These are enumerated in the Vājasaneyīsamhitā XXX 5-22 and the Taittirīya Brāhmana III 4, while the Śatapatha Brāhmana (XIII. 6. 2. 12, 13) says " ... Now, the victims had the fire carried round them, but they were not yet slaughtered. Then a voice said to him, 'Purusha, do not consummate (these human victims) if thou wert to consummate them, man (purusha) would eat man! Accordingly, as soon as fire had been carried round them, he set them free, and offered oblations to the same divinities.... ..'"² The Kātyāyana Śrauta Sūtra XXI 1. 12 clearly says that the Brāhmanas and the other victims are released, just as the Kapīṅjala birds and the other wild animals are set free in the Aśvamedha after the paryagnikarana (XX. 6 9). It is true that there are two Śrauta Sūtras, Vaitāna (XXXVII. 10 ff) and Śāṅkhāyana (XVI 10 ff.), which set forth a form of Purusamedha in which a man is to be sacrificed, but these Sūtras lack Brāhmana authority for what they prescribe, and as Eggeling points out, the Purusamedha described therein "is nothing more than what Śāṅkhāyana appears to claim for it, viz. an adaptation, and that a comparatively modern adaptation, of the existing Aśvamedha ritual." Further, "the very fact that, in both Sūtra works, this sacrifice is represented as being undertaken, not for the great object of winning immortal life, but for the healing of the Sacrificer's bodily infirmities, might seem sufficient to stamp the ceremony as one partaking more of the nature of the superstitious rites of the Atharvan priests than of that of the great sacrifices of the traditional Śrauta ritual."³ According to Keith, the ritual prescribed in the versions of Śāṅkhāyana and the Vaitāna "is a mere priestly invention to fill up the apparent gap in the sacrificial system which provided no place for man"⁴ Hillebrandt gives too much importance to the version of Śāṅkhāyana and remarks that the Purusamedha is a relic of a barbaric age,¹ but the statement is vague, and there are no reliable data which might enable us to determine the limits of this 'barbaric age'. The evidence of the Śatapatha Brāhmana, a far more ancient text, is of greater value than that of the two Sūtra texts, and the fact remains that as early as the age of the Śatapatha Brāhmana no human victims were sacrificed in the Purusamedha. More generally speaking, the legend of Śunahśepa "is enough to show that human sacrifice was for the Brāhmana period a horror beyond words"² It is also noteworthy that the Purusamedha is not mentioned at all in the Samhitās of the Black Yajurveda the Taittirīya, the Mantrāyaṇi and the Kāthaka nor in the comprehensive Baudhāyana Śrauta Sūtra.³

Another misleading statement made by Somadeva in Yasastilaka, Book IV, concerns the Gosava sacrifice. He opines that this rite was devised to sanction incest with one's mother and sister⁴. The Gosava was an ekāha or one-day sacrifice and usually performed by a man of position of the Vaiśya caste, who might be honoured by the king and the people. The man who performed the Gosava was thereafter called Sthapati, an honorific term. According to some, this rite was exclusively meant for the Vaiśya caste, and one of its important features was that fresh milk was poured over the Sacrificer while seated on the bare ground to the south of the Āhavanīya fire. This is roughly the account of the Gosava given in the Kātyāyana Śrauta Sūtra XXII 11 6-11. The prescribed sacrificial fee of a myriad oxen shows that the rite was performed by a wealthy man, and according to the Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra XVI 15. 1 it should be undertaken by one who desires cattle. The Taittirīya Brāhmana II. 7. 6 and Tāndya Brāhmana XIX. 13. 1 connect the Gosava with Svārājya or supremacy as the promised goal, and in any case the rite was meant for a leading man of the community as marking the culminating point in his social rank and position. As pointed out by Hillebrandt,⁵ there were certain special sacrifices for particular classes of men, e. g. the Rājasūya for the Kṣatriyas, the Brhaspatisava for the Brāhmanas and the Sūta-, Sthapati-, Grāmanī-, and Go-sava for the other orders of society. Now, the Gosava had a particular connection with the bovine species. The Taittirīya Brāhmana (op cit) observes that the ox is Supremacy, and the Sacrificer acts like an ox⁶. "Just as an ox roams freely in the woods, so does the Sacrificer in the Brahmaloka" does not appear to be accurate in view of the detailed explanation of the rite given in the Jaiminiya Brāhmaṇa II 113¹ The latter text describes the vrata of the Gosava and it consists in imitating the ways of an ox The Sacrificer is to lie with his mother, his sister, and a woman of his own gotra, drink water and eat grass with face downwards, and ease himself wherever he feels the necessity² It is said that Janaka of Videha wanted to perform the Gosava, but when he was told about the procedure, he declared that he was willing to pay the prescribed sacrificial fee, but not to undertake the vrata, and did not after all venture to set about the rite Punyakeśa, the king of the Śibis, once undertook the Gosava. He felt like easing himself in the royal assembly, and while uncovering himself for the purpose then and there, exclaimed that the rite was suitable only for old men, and only an old man should undertake it, for 'all this' is permissible to the old The Brāhmaṇa therefore concludes that the Gosava was a sthavrayajña, and should be undertaken only at an advanced age³ It was thus an apparently innocent sacrifice primarily designed for old people, free from the repulsive significance attributed to it by Jain writers. It may be noted that the vrata described in the Jaiminiya Brāhmaṇa is omitted in most of the texts dealing with the Gosava, e g., in the Srauta Sūtras of Kātyāyana (op cit), Śāṅkhāyana 14 15, Baudhāyana 18. 7 and Āśvalāyana 9 8, and the Tāndya Brāhmaṇa 19 13, while the Taittiriya Brāhmaṇa (op cit) seems to make only a passing reference to it gauriva bhavati Caland shows that there is good reason to believe that the Jaiminiya Brāhmaṇa is older than the Tāndya or Pañcaviṃśa Brāhmaṇa, and he thinks that the latter text omitted certain details, e g the of vrata the Gosava, perhaps because it found them too 'barbaric'⁴ It is quite probable that the childish procedure of behaving like an ox became soon obsolete, and was excluded from the customary ritual of the Gosava

Somadeva is not the only Jain author to make misleading statements regarding Vedic sacrifices Ravisena asserts in Padmacarita 11. 85 that intercourse with forbidden women is required in the Gosava sacrifice. Devasena who wrote Darsanasāra in 933 A D⁵ says in his Prakṛit Bhāvasamgraha (verses 52-3) that the cow is declared to be a goddess (by the Brāhmanas) and all the gods are believed to reside in her body, yet they kill her in the Gosava sacrifice and eat the flesh, do they not kill those gods by killing the cow?¹ The Jainas had a tendency to believe that all sacrifices whose names began with the name of a living creature involved its slaughter in the accompanying ritual

Another example of erroneous statements made by Jaina writers about Vedic rites is found in Ravisena's Padmacarita 11. 87-89.

These verses containing details, corresponding more or less to particulars found in Vedic texts, might very well deceive an unwary reader not familiar with the Vedic sacrificial system. Among the terms used juhvaka is a misreading for jumbaka, and viklava for viklīdha. Ravisena means to say that oblations are offered in the fire on the back of a tortoise, but if one is not available, the offerings are made in a fire kindled on the head of a Brāhmana with certain characteristics, immersed in the water up to the mouth. This is an atrocious misrepresentation of a Vedic rite which took place on the third day of the Āsvamedha towards the end of the sacrifice at the end of the purificatory bath (avabhṛtha). What really happened was that an oblation of clarified butter was made on the head of a man of hideous appearance, standing in the water, with the mantra 'To Jumbaka hail!' The mantra occurs in the Vāgasaneyi-samhitā 25. 9, Jumbaka being a name of Varuna as explained, for instance, in the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa III. 9 15. Among the epithets applied to the man the most frequent are pingala 'tawny-eyed', khalati 'bald-headed', viklīdha, and sukla 'white' or rather 'pale'. As regards viklīdha, it is variously explained as dantura 'with protruding teeth' by Karka on the Kātyāyana S'rauta Sūtra XX. 8. 16, Mahīdhara on the Vāgasaneyi-samhitā 25. 9, and Harisvāmin on the Satapatha Brāhmaṇa XIII. 3 6. 5, as svedanasīlasarīra and viklīnnadeha 'perspiring' 'clammy' by Sāyana, on the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa (op cit.), and as 'leprous' by Varadattasuta Ānartīya in his commentary on the Sāṅkhāyana S'rauta Sūtra 16. 18. The latter text as well as the Baudhāyana S'rauta Sūtra 15. 37 uses some other epithets to make the man still more repulsive, and Sāṅkhāyana adds that he should be led to a river and immersed therein, and when the waters flow into his mouth the Adhvaryu priest should make an oblation of horse's blood on the man's head with the mantra 'bhrūnahatyāyari svāhā'. After the oblation the man is brought out of the water (nihsedhanti explained in the commentary as nirgamayanti), and possibly driven away as a scapegoat. Just as there are no traces of remnants of human sacrifice in this rite, as Weber thought, similarly it did not involve any inhuman practice like lighting a fire on a man's head, as alleged by Ravisena.

1 सुरही लोयस्तग्ने वक्त्राण्यस्य देवि पञ्चक्त्वा । सन्वे देवा अगे इमिह गिवसति गियमेण ॥ पुणरवि गोसवजग्णे मसं भंक्वति सा वि मारिता । तस्सेव बहेण फुड ण मारिया होति ते देवा ॥

It is hardly necessary to cite other examples of Jaina misstatements regarding Vedic rites. Ravisena tells us also that in a sacrifice called Mātrmedha one's mother was killed, while in the Pitrmedha one's father suffered the same fate (11. 86). Jinasena I states that kings were sacrificed by hundreds and thousands in the Rājasūya, which, according to him, was devised by the wicked god Mahākāla, an enemy of kings. This amazing statement occurs in his Harivaṃśapurāṇa written in 783 A. D.¹ Hemacandra mentions a Gomedha and a Narmedha along with the Aśvamedha in a sweeping condemnation of Vedic sacrifices in a verse of his commentary on his Yogaśāstra 4. 102.² In another amusing verse in the same work (2. 38) he declares that the poor Cārvāka is rather preferable to Jaini, because the former openly professes atheism, while the latter is a monster disguised as an ascetic citing Vedic texts.³

It is evident that much of the information of Jaina writers in regard to Vedic rites was based on hearsay, and the only thing they definitely knew about them was that they involved the sacrifice of living beings, men as well as animals. Their statements are no doubt mala fide, misleading and erroneous, but similar inaccuracies are found also in the Mātharavṛtti on the Sāṅkhyakārikā.⁴ It may be noted in this connection that the following sacrificial verse is quoted, perhaps inaccurately, in both the Mātharavṛtti and Somadeva's Yasastilaka VII. 30:

पद्मशतानि नियुज्यन्ते पशूना मध्येऽहनि । अश्वमेधस्य वचनादूनानि पशुभिस्त्रिभिः ॥

1 सद्यन्ते च राजानः शतशोऽपि सहस्रशः । राजसूयक्रतुस्तेन दर्शितो राजवैरिणा ॥ 23 142.

2 गोमेधनरमेधाश्वमेधाध्वरकारिणाम् । वाशिकानां कुतो धर्मः प्रणिवातविधायिनाम् ॥

3 वर वराकश्चावांको योऽसौ प्रकटनास्तिक । वेदोक्तापसच्छब्दच्छत्र रक्षो न जैमिनि ॥

4 The Mātharavṛtti misunderstands the significance of the Purusamedha and the Gosava. It says पशुवधोऽग्निष्टोमे मानुषवध गोसव्यवस्था सौत्रामण्या सुरापान 'कल्पसूत्रेऽन्यदपि अकृत्य भूरिकर्तव्यतयोपदिश्वते 'ब्रह्मणे ब्राह्मणमालभेत क्षत्राय राजन्यं मरुद्भ्यो वैश्यं तत्स्करं नारकाय वीरहणम्' इत्यादि अवगात् ।

The verse occurs in a different form in the commentaries of Uvāta and Mahidhara on the Vājasaneyīsamhitā 24. 40 :

षट्शताति नियुज्यन्ते पशूना मध्यमेऽहनि । अश्वमेधस्य यज्ञस्य नवभिश्चाधिकानि च ॥

Among other sacrificial citations, all of which are anonymous, we have already reproduced the dubious statement on the Gosava sacrifice quoted in Yasastilaka, Books IV and VII. 30. The dictum सौत्रामणौ य एवविधां सुरा पिबति न तेन सुरा पीता भवति quoted in the same context cannot be genuine, because although the reference to wine is correct, the name of the rite (sautrāmaṇi) is incorrectly spelt. The word is, in fact, consistently misspelt by Somadeva who writes sautrāmaṇi for sautrāmaṇi.¹ The following sacrificial verse is cited in VII. 30

गोसवे सुरभिं हन्यादाजसूये तु भूभुजम् । अश्वमेधे हर्यं हन्यात् पौण्डरीके च दन्तिनम् ॥

The verse is clearly spurious, and might even be an invention, as it contains the absurd statement that the king is sacrificed at the Rājasūya. The only reference to human sacrifice in the ritual of the Rājasūya is in the legend of Śunahśepa, which is recited by the Hotr priest after the anointing of the king, but the story in question is nothing less than a condemnation of the offering of a human victim. Hillebrandt's view that the recitation of the legend is a reminiscence of a possible early connection of the Rājasūya with human sacrifice is clearly far-fetched, and has been rejected by Keith.²

The following citation bearing on the Puruṣamedha in Yasastilaka VII. 30 is an example of haphazard quotation or misquotation from sacrificial texts. It reads as follows in Somadeva's work

ब्रह्मणे ब्राह्मणमालभेत् इन्द्राय क्षत्रियं मरुद्भ्यो वैश्यं तमसे शूद्रमुत्तमसे तस्करम् आत्मने क्लीवं कामाय
बुध्वलमतिकुष्टाय मागधं गीताय सुतमादित्याय स्त्रियं गर्भिणीम् ।

The passage in question forms part of a longer one found with variations in the Vājasaneyīsamhitā XXX. 5ff, the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa III 4, and the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa XIII. 6. 2. The ancient text, e. g. that of the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, reads as follows :

ब्रह्मणे ब्राह्मणमालभेत् । क्षत्राय राजन्यम् । मरुद्भ्यो वैश्यम् । तपसे शूद्रम् । तमसे तस्करम् । नारकाय
वीरहणम् । पाप्मने क्लीबम् । आक्रयायायोगूम् । कामाय पुंश्चलम् । अतिकुष्टाय मागधम् । गीताय सूतम् । वृत्ताय
शैलम् ।

The principles underlying Vedic injunctions are criticized by Somadeva in the aforesaid controversial dialogue in Yasastilaka, Book

IV¹ Similar objections to the authority of the Veda as a whole are recorded in various Jaina works, e g - Akalanka's Nyāyavṃścāya (chap 3), Anantavīrya's commentary on the Parikṣāmukha Sūtra (chap. 3) etc. Akalanka attacks the apauruṣeya theory of the origin of the Veda, and says that if the Veda revealed its own truth, it would be unnecessary to study texts like the Āyurveda, which are an integral part of the Veda. Further, if the Veda was eternal, the generations of students who have been studying and explaining it would be like an endless succession of blind men following one another, and if the Veda had really no author, its statements would be like the utterances and customs of barbarians which could not be attributed to any competent authority² Anantavīrya goes further and opines that the Veda cannot be regarded as an authoritative source of knowledge, whether it is supposed to be apauruṣeya or pauruṣeya. In the former case, supposing there exists an endless sequence of Vedic interpretation current from times without a beginning, this interpretation is bound to go astray in the course of time owing to defects of memory, ineptitude of expression, and dishonest motives, thus destroying the authoritative character of the Veda. Even at the present time those who profess astrology, for instance, are seen to make misleading statements, there are some who know the hidden truth but explain it otherwise for some evil purpose, there are some who know the subject but misinterpret it for lack of the faculty of expression, while there are others who make incorrect statements, having missed a vital link in the sequence of facts. The same is the case with the Veda, hence the divergence of opinions regarding bhāvanā, vidhi, nyaya etc., and disagreement among Manu, Yājñavalkya and others in laying down Smṛti rules in harmony with the true import of the Vedas. Thus the Veda would fail to conform to the truth even if it were based on a tradition without any beginning. The apauruṣeya theory therefore does not help to establish the Veda as a reliable and infallible guide, nor is the pauruṣeya theory more helpful. There are indeed good reasons for supposing the Veda to be the composition of a certain individual or individuals, e. g the mention of the names of the sages, gotras and schools, subject to birth and decay, the arrangement of the sentences according to a hard and fast rule, and the dictum that 'The Veda is the work of a certain person like the Sūtras of Manu' etc. The fact of the Veda having an author does not, however, give it an authoritative character. Anantavīrya declares "We do not deny authority to the Veda on the ground that it has no author. The Veda lacks authority because it can never be free from defects owing to its expounders having no knowledge of supersensuous things"¹ The Jainas thus close the door, to their own satisfaction, upon all claims that may be put forward in behalf of the Veda being an authoritative source of human knowledge.

It is extremely doubtful if Jaina attacks on the Veda and the Vedic religion made any impression upon Brahmanical circles if they were at all acquainted with them. The regeneration of the Vedic sacrificial system was out of the question, but renewed and vigorous attempts continued to be made to establish the authority of the Veda on a firmer and sounder basis. The first great effort towards this end in mediæval times was made by Kumārila (seventh century A. D.) and the school of Mīmāṃsā founded by him and thereafter by the distinguished writers of the Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika school who flourished in the ninth and tenth centuries. It was the leaders of the latter school that exercised paramount influence in the intellectual sphere in Somadeva's age. The Naiyāyikas rejected the Mīmāṃsā view that the Veda was eternal, and not composed by any individual, and sought to replace the apauruṣeya theory by a more plausible doctrine. Jayanta says in his Nyāyamañjarī that the Mīmāṃsakas are incapable of devising an adequate method for maintaining the authority of the Veda. words aided by convention can only have the power to signify, the determination of the shades of meaning must inevitably depend upon the judgment of some one, hence words can have any authoritative character only when they are uttered by a trustworthy person and not otherwise² The Naiyāyikas thus usher in the pauruṣeya theory and glorify the Veda as the handiwork of God Himself. Jayanta, for instance, says that He who created the universe composed also the Vedas containing His teachings, and the people believe in the Vedas because they believe in Him, the Trustworthy Guide and the Supreme Lord without a beginning no wise man would have thus believed in the Vedas, had they been without an author (as the Mīmāṃsakas hold).¹

While emphasizing the fact the Veda is composed by God and accepted by the vast majority of the people, the leaders of the Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika school adopt a rather contemptuous attitude towards the Scriptures of the minorities like the Buddhists and Jainas. Vācaspati in Nyāya-vārtika-tātparya-tīkā 2 1. 68 contrasts the Vedas with the Buddhist and Jaina Scriptures composed by mere mortals who are neither Creators nor Omniscient Beings.² Śrīdhara says in Nyāyakandalī (p. 217) that the Veda is known to be the work of a Superior Being (puruṣa-viseṣa), because its message is unquestioningly accepted by all who belong to the varṇāśrama order of society. If it were the work of an ordinary person, like the Scriptures composed by Buddha and others, not all discerning persons would unquestioningly act upon its teachings. That with regard to which there is a universal consensus of opinion (on the subject of its reliability) is bound to be an authoritative source of knowledge, like direct perception and similar means of cognition.³ Thus while the Vedic sacrificial religion was fast becoming a relic of the past, the authority of the Veda was constantly reaffirmed by Mīmāṃsakas, Smārtas, and Nyāya-Vaiśeṣikas alike. It is noteworthy that even Śaṅkara in his Bhāṣya on the Vedānta Sūtras 3. 1. 25 supports in principle the slaughter of animals in Vedic sacrifices, and proclaims the purity of all rites prescribed by the Veda. The voice of Jaina criticism was not likely to be heard in an age characterized by a large-scale revival of Brahmanical thought, say, from about the seventh to the end of the tenth century.

The cult of the Devī, who is known under different names, Candikā, Kātyāyanī, Bhavānī, Durgā etc, seems to have been widely prevalent from about the seventh century onwards. The cult, as ordinarily practised, represents what is known as Śakti worship, and must be distinguished from the abnormal ritual mentioned by Somadeva in Yasastilaka. There are, for instance, two rock-cut temples dedicated to Durgā at Māmallapuram, now the village of Mahābalipuram, known also as the Seven Pagodas, on the sea-coast, about forty miles south of Madras. The excavations at this place date from the second quarter of the seventh century A D¹. The temples are locally known, the one as Kotikal Mandapa, and the other as Draupadī's Ratha². The former is a primitive-looking shrine consisting of a hall, about 22 feet long and eight feet wide. The latter is a beautifully carved little shrine with a domical roof, and contains a bas-relief figure of Durgā. In front of the temple is a huge rock-cut figure of Durgā's vehicle, the lion. There are, besides, various sculptural representations of the goddess on some of the other temples and rocks at Māmallapuram. A number of crudely fashioned figures of the goddess and her lion are also carved on some of the isolated rocks near the Shore Temple facing the sea. In the so-called Draupadī's Ratha the bas-relief figure of Durgā is four-armed and portrayed standing on a lotus pedestal with two worshippers kneeling at her feet. These features are also seen in the bas-relief representation of the goddess in one of the large panels on the walls of the temple known as the Varāhamandapa. Other panels, which represent the goddess with eight arms, and trampling on the head of a buffalo, occur on the facade of the Trimūrti Temple and in the the Birkhala cliffs, at the eastern end of the island, on to the rocks by the river brink, where the terrible god Kāla Bhairava resided. The last such offering to Kāla Bhairava was witnessed in 1824. It is significant that the shrine of Candamārī is called Mahābhairava in Somadeva's Yasastilaka. It is said that about the time when a Chauhan Rajput named Bhārat Singh took Māndhātā from Nathu Bhil in 1165 A D, a priest named Daryāo Nāth used to worship Omkāra Śiva on the island. There is a legend that Daryāo Nāth by his austerities shut up Kālī Devī, the consort of Kāla Bhairava, who fed on human flesh, in a cave, for the protection of the pilgrims. The mouth of this cave is still shown. It was also arranged that Kāla Bhairava should in future receive human sacrifices at regular intervals. The disciples of Daryāo Nāth still enjoy lands on account of the worship of Omkāra Śivā. Imperial Gazetteer of India, Vol IX, p 293 ff. It is difficult to separate fact from fiction in these traditions, but an abnormal variety of Tāntric cult seems to have grown up, evidently at a later time, on the island of Māndhātā, and no doubt represented a debased type of Śaivism or Tāntricism resembling the Vāmamārga described in Somadeva's Yasastilaka.

interior of the Vaiāha Temple The story of Durgā slaying the Buffalo Demon was popular not only in India but in Java, and a remarkable bas-relief showing the fight of the goddess with the demon, regarded as one of the finest specimens of Indian art, is found in the so-called Mahāsūramandapa. The eight-armed goddess, astride on her lion, is represented as shooting arrows at the demon whose colossal figure is seen slightly receding before her, with one of his followers slain and another apparently wounded¹ It is also noteworthy that, in the bas-reliefs in the Draupadī's Ratha and the Vaiāhamandapa, one of the worshippers is shown as cutting off the tresses of his hair with a sword as a votive offering to the goddess. Such practices are, of course, far different from the various forms of self-torture practised in connection with the cult of Candamāī, or Candikā, as described by Somadeva and others. The practices described by Somadeva in Yasastilaka evidently belong to an abnormal variety of the cult, which appealed to the fanaticism of a limited class of worshippers. But the cult of the Devī, in the ordinary sense of the term, had a much wider appeal, and old temples dedicated to the Goddess are found in various parts of India.² The cult was, as stated below, popular

- 1 The scene is represented on a much smaller scale in a beautiful panel discovered near the Śiva temple at Bhumara of the early Gupta period (see Appendix III) The goddess is four-armed with a sword in one hand and a trident in another She stands with her left foot on the head of the buffalo and grasps his tail with one of her hands See plate xiv (b) in R. D. Banerji's monograph on the temple
- 2 Some of the old temples dedicated to Devī may here be mentioned, many of which have been rebuilt in later times The temple of Ambā Bhavānī on the summit of the hills of Arasur at the south-western extremity of the Aravalī range is an important centre of pilgrimage, and lays claim to a remote antiquity. The ancient town of Darbhavati or Dabhoi, about twenty miles to the south-east of the city of Baroda, contains a temple dedicated to Bhadrā Kālkā Mātā (Bhadrakālī). It is situated to the right of the famous Hira Gate at Dabhoi on the east side of the old fort, and stands on the site of an older shrine in honour of the same goddess It was probably built by Viśhaldev Vaghela about 1255 A. D. 'Its dimensions are small, but the whole outer face has been so broken by mouldings, and ornamented by sculptures, large and small, as to render it typical of the rich thirteenth century style in Gujarat' The temple is, in fact, one of the most important architectural monuments of the pre-Muslim period in Gujarat Another Devī temple known as Kālkā Mātā or Kālkā Bhavānī stands on the lofty summit of the hill of Pavagadh situated about twenty five miles north-east of Baroda The goddess has been worshipped on the rocky peak for many centuries as the guardian deity of the hill 'The shrine, which is visible from a distance of many miles in the plains below, is no doubt very ancient, being mentioned as a place of pilgrimage under the rulers of Anhilvad Patan' But the present building is probably of a much later date. Commissariat History of Gujarat, Vol. I, pp. lxi, lxxvii, 191. An ancient temple of Devī or Candikā, venerated by Rajputs throughout Malwa and Mewar, exists at the small village of Antri in the Garoth District of Indore State The present temple is, however, a modern structure built with the materials collected from the ruins of an older shrine.

at royal courts, as it was believed to promote success in warfare. The temples and sculptures at Māmallapuram, which was essentially a royal foundation, prove the popularity of the cult of Durgā, probably for similar reasons, during the rule of the Pallavas in the south from the seventh century onwards. The Pallavas were supplanted by the Colas, and it is noteworthy that Vijayālaya, the founder of the line of the imperial Colas, built a Durgā temple at Tanjore¹ after his conquest of the city about the middle of the ninth century A. D.² It may be noted that about this time, in Northern

A small temple dedicated to the god Sambā (Śambhu) and Devī stands outside the village of Dighi, six miles due east of Kajgaon Station in the East Khandesh District, a couple of miles from the frontier of Hyderabad (Deccan). 'The temple consists of a porch in front, a mandapa on pillars with a high dome, an antarāla or passage leading to the sanctum or garbhagrha and the sanctum or shrine itself.' The sanctum contains a small linga and a large standing image of Devī. A niche on the north wall of the mandapa contains a dancing figure of Cāmundā. She has four hands and an emaciated body, but the scorpion usually to be found in her stomach is absent. She holds a trident, a skull-mace (khatvāṅga) and a skull cup (nara kapāla). Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, 1920, pp. 75, 99. Close to the island of māndhātā in the Narmadā, a small ravine on the north bank of the river, popularly known as the Rāwana nālā, contains 'a prostrate figure 18½ feet in length, rudely carved in bold relief on four basalt slabs laid end to end. It has ten arms, all holding clubs and pendent skulls, but only one head. On its chest is a scorpion, and at its right side a rat, while one foot rests on a smaller prostrate human figure.' The huge image no doubt represents Cāmundā or Mīhākālī, and was evidently intended to be placed in a colossal temple which was never completed. The bed of the ravine is covered with huge basalt rocks, slightly carved in some places, which doubtless had the same destination.' Imperial Gazetteer of India, Vol. IX, p. 296.

Temples of Durgā appear to have been built in different parts of medieval India. An inscription discovered in the village of Dirghāsī, four miles to the north of Kalingapatam in the Ganjam District, records the erection of a mandapa in front of a temple of Durgā at Dirgharāsī or Dirghāsī in the Śaka year 997 (1075 A. D.), by a Brāhmaṇa chieftain named Ganapati in the service of the Eastern Ganga king Rājārāja I of Orissa (1068-1078 A. D.). R. D. Banerji, History of Orissa, Vol. I, p. 246. There is a ruined temple of Durgā of about the twelfth century, near the village of Balsana in the West Khandesh District of Bombay Presidency. Inside the shrine stands the mutilated image of the goddess. The temples at Balsana suffered badly at the hands of the Muslim invaders. An inscription on the stone lintel of a ruined temple bears a date corresponding to 1148 A. D. See Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, 1919, pp. 46, 56. There is an old temple called the temple of Devī Hinglāj in the village of Baridelchi near Mehādpur Town in Indore State. The edifice has been partially rebuilt, as the śikhara and the garbhagrha are modern, but the porch in front has four well-carved medieval pillars. Inside the shrine is an old image which is a very good representation of the killing of the buffalo demon by Durgā (Mahāsamardini). Progress Report of ASI, Western Circle, 1920, p. 102.

India, Durgā or Bhagavatī was fervently worshipped by some of the Gurjara-Pratihāra emperors of Kanauj¹

Somadeva is not the only Jaina writer of the tenth century who refers to the cult of Candikā. A few decades earlier, Devasena in his Bhāvasamgraha (verse 76) mentions the killing of goats at the altar of Candikā and the worship of the Kula² with wine while Siddharsī in his Upamitabhavaprapañcā Kathā (Book IV) refers to the worship of Candikā with wine and describes drinking bouts and merymaking in the forecourt of the shrine of the goddess with their evil consequences. So far as Somadeva is concerned, the cult of Candikā is located by him in the city of Rājapura in the Yaudheya country, which has been variously identified as the region between the Sutlej and the Jumna, or Bahawalpur State in the Punjab, south of Multan³. If the Yaudheya country is supposed to be the region between the Sutlej and the Jumna, Rājapura may perhaps be identified with Rajpura in Patiala state, now an important junction on the North Western Railway. Somadeva describes Rājapura as full of magnificent temples, and it is obviously the capital of the Yaudheya country, but we cannot be certain about its identification. It may be noted in this connection that a Rājapura is mentioned by Yuan Chwang,⁴ and it has been identified with the Rājapurī frequently mentioned in the Rājataranginī, the modern Rajauri in the province of Jammu in Kashmir. We have no evidence to connect Rājapurī with the Candikā cult, but the Chinese traveller describes the inhabitants from Lampa to Rājapura as 'of rude violent dispositions' and as 'inferior peoples of frontier (i. e. barbarian) stocks', reminding one of the Sabaras who were in the habit of worshipping the goddess under different names. But few ancient remains have been discovered at Rajauri, and a recent survey revealed nothing except a few architectural fragments belonging to temples similar to those of Kashmir proper⁵. The site of Rājapura is, as a matter of fact, of little importance with regard to the cult of Candamārī. Somadeva's account is in some respects so graphic and detailed that he seems to write from first-hand knowledge of the cult, as it was practised by certain zealots in his time somewhere in the Deccan.

1 The Partabgarh inscription of Mahendrapāla II (946 A. D.) has, for instance, two verses in praise of Durgā almost at the beginning. Nāgabhatta II (first half of 9th century), Bhoja I (second half of 9th century) and Mahendrapāla I (end of 9th and early 10th century) are described as ardent devotees of Bhagavatī or Durgā (parambhagavatī-bhakta). MI, Vol. XIV, p. 176 ff.

The Mahāyoginīs are described by Somadeva in Yasastilaka, Book I, in connection with the temple of Candamārī. The description is rather fantastic, but the author's purpose is to depict the terrific aspect of these deities and represent them as fit companions of Candamārī. In Book III the spy is declared to have communed with the Mahāyoginīs and acquired supersensuous knowledge.¹ These references are interesting as illustrating the fact that the cult of the Yoginīs was prevalent in the tenth century. It is noteworthy that the circular temple of the sixty-four Yoginīs at Bheraghat, thirteen miles from Jubbulpore, has also been assigned to the tenth century.² This peculiar shrine 'consists of a huge thick wall along the outer edge of a circular platform, inside which there is a circular row of pillars and pilasters arranged in two concentric circles'. There is a flat roof supported on the pillars and pilasters. According to Cunningham, the temple of the Sixty-four Yoginīs was originally a simple circular enclosure, containing the images of the Yoginīs, the wall being of the same height as the statues. He concluded that the circular cloister, as it at present stands, is the work of two different periods: the old circular wall, with its inscribed statues, belonging to the tenth century; and the cloister, with its roof, being the work of queen Alhanādevī in the twelfth century. The actual number of images in the shrine including various other figures is more than eighty. Most of them are seated, with the names of the deities inscribed on the pedestals in letters of the tenth century. For example, Śrī-Thakini, Śrī-Virendrī, Śrī-Phanendrī, Śrī-Ksatradharminī, Śrī-Bhisanī, Śrī-Ghamtālī, Śrī-Jaha, Śrī-Dākinī, Śrī-Lampatā, Śrī-Indrajālī, Śrī-Īśvarī, Śrī-Aṅginī, Śrī-Candikā, Śrī-Ajitā, Śrī-Piṅgalā, Śrī-Vāihī, Śrī-Erūdi, Śrī-Vibhatsā, Śrī-Kāmadā, Śrī-Ranājūrā etc. A beautiful figure of Mahisamardinī is called Śrī-Tejamvā. The existence of a separate temple for the worship of the sixty-four Yoginīs shows the popularity of Tāntic cults in the tenth century. It is interesting to note that, under the lotus on which Śrī-Sarvatomukhī is seated is another fullblown lotus, the calyx of which bears the Tāntic emblem of crossed triangles (Ṣaṭkoṇa), with the mystic formula Hrīm in the-centre.³

Another temple dedicated to the sixty-four Yoginīs exists at Khajurāho in Chhatarpur State in Central India. 'The script of the brief inscriptions on its walls does not indicate a period much, if at all, anterior to 900 A. D', and the temple has accordingly been assigned to the first half of the tenth century. Three other temples dedicated to the 64 Yoginīs are known to exist, viz, 1) at Surādā in the Pātan or Pattana State, one of the Tributary States of Orissa, 2) at Rānīpur-Jurāl in the same State; and 3) in Coimbatore District, Madras. It is a remarkable fact that all the known temples dedicated to the 64 Yoginīs are circular, except the one at Khajurāho, which is 'peculiar in being oblong'.¹

Somadeva refers to the Mothers in connection with the cult of Caṇḍamārī. In his description of the temple of the goddess, in Yasastilaka Book I, he speaks of the Mātrīmandala or the group of the Mothers as being worshipped there by certain fanatics, who had torn out their intestines to please those deities.² The Seven Mothers are here brought into relation with a horrid and ferocious cult, but they had also a benign aspect, and are well-known as the guardian deities of the early Cālukyas, as stated in their copper-plate grants.³ Sculptural representations of these deities have been found at Aihole and other places in the Deccan.⁴ The Seven Mothers, four-armed, each with a child, figure among the sculptures on the south wall of Cave XIV at Ellora, popularly known as Ravana-ka-kai each has her cognizance on the base below.⁵ There is a very well-executed sculpture representing the Seven Mothers on a stone slab, built into the wall of a step-well, out in front of the temple of Siddheśvara at Haveri in the Dharwar district. 'On most of these slabs each goddess holds a child on her lap to denote motherhood, but they are absent on this, and they are generally flanked by Śiva on one side and Ganapati on the other. Next to Śiva, in this case, is Brāhmī or Brāhmānī, the female counterpart of Brahmā, below her being Brahmā's vehicle, the goose. Next is Māheśvarī, Śiva's counterpart, with his bull Nandi, beside whom is Vaiṣṇavī seated over Garuda. After her come Kaumārī, counterpart of Kārtikeya, with his peacock; Vārāhī with a buffalo instead of the boar; Indrī or Andrī with the elephant, and, lastly, Cāmundā with a dog, but sometimes a dead body. This last Mother is shown as a skeleton with long pendent breasts.

Each goddess has four arms, and in their hands they carry symbols belonging to the gods they represent. The arrangement is not always the same.¹ Various sculptures representing Siva and the Seven Mothers are found in the temples at Un in the southern part of Indore State.²

The worship of the goddess Aparājītā is mentioned by Somadeva in Book III as part of the general description of the court life of Yaśodhara. In three verses recited by a bard the blessings of the goddess are invoked for the success of the king in warfare. We are told that Aparājītā, called also Ambikā, grants victory to kings on the battlefield, and is herself incarnate in their arms and weapons. The stars are the pearls on her hair, and the sun and the moon are her eyes; the celestial river is her robe, and the oceans are her girdle, and the Meru mountain is her body. She is worshipped by Indra, Śiva, Brahmā and Viṣṇu.³ It is clear from the Devīmāhātmya section of Mārkaṇḍeyapurāṇa (chap. 88 ff.) that Aparājītā, Ambikā, Durgā, Kātyāyanī, Gauṛī, Bhadrakālī etc. are different names of Candikā, they are to be regarded rather as different forms of Candikā, and worshipped on different occasions for special purposes. The meditation of Aparājītā is recommended in the medieval Tantric work Īśānasvagrūpaderapaddhati in the course of the ritual prescribed for the worship of Gauṛī,⁴ and it is interesting to note that one of the rites is meant for the king and prescribed to ensure his victory in war.⁵ The same work treats in detail of the worship of Durgā, who is significantly described as capable of destroying hostile armies.⁶ Aparājītā is thus one of those deities whose worship was favoured at the royal court as a means to vanquishing the enemies of the king.

We learn further from Yasastilaka that the worship of Aparājītā took place on the Mahānavamī day, and the occasion is, in fact, more important than the name of the goddess. The Mahānavamī festival is mentioned by Somadeva also in Book I, wherein we are told that Māradatta invited the populace to the temple of Candikā on the pretext of celebrating the festival, although it was not the proper season for it¹ Śrutasāgara in his commentary defines Mahānavamī as the ninth day of the bright fortnight of the month of Caitra. Another Jaina writer, Udayavīra, in his Pārisvanāthacarita (chap. IV) includes the Mahānavamī rites among non-Jaina cults and practices and assigns them to the bright fortnight of Caitra and Āśvina². It was usual to celebrate the festival in the latter month, and Mahānavamī was the ninth day of the bright half of Āśvina, marking the culmination of the Navarātri rites commencing from the pratipad of that month. Strictly speaking, the term mahānavamī was applied to the eighth lunar day of the bright half of Āśvina when in conjunction with the Mūla constellation, and the eighth as well as the ninth day was appointed for the worship of the goddess Cāmundā or Durgā³. The Garudapurāṇa (chap. 134) gives a similar definition of Mahānavamī, but mentions a different constellation⁴.

The Devīpurāṇa (Chap. XXII) gives a detailed account of the Mahānavamī rites which had a special significance for the king. On the eighth or astamī day nine wooden pavilions were erected, or even one, wherein was installed an image of Durgā made of gold or silver or earth or wood. The goddess could also be worshipped in a symbolic way in a consecrated sword or a spear. The king repeated in silence mystic formulas before the goddess and sacrificed an animal after midnight for obtaining victory, the flesh and blood of the victim being offered to the goblins by repeating the Mahākuśika formula. The king then took a ceremonial bath and hit a paste model of his enemy with a sword and presented it to Skanda and Viśākha. This is a remarkable feature of the Mahānavamī cult and illustrates all the more clearly its connection with the king and his security and military plans.

The corresponding account in Garudapurāṇa (chapters 134 and 135) gives some additional details. The Durgā image is provided with diverse weapons, and appears to have eighteen hands, the left ones holding various objects, a skull, a shield, a mirror, a bell, a flag, a noose, a drum etc., and the right ones the weapons, spear, lance, club, dart, bolt, arrows etc. Nine other attendant deities with sixteen hands, Ugracandā, Candanāyikā, Candā, Aticandikā etc., are also worshipped and a five year old buffalo is sacrificed in the latter part of the night. It is probable that of the two accounts that in the Devīpurāṇa records an older version of the Mahānavamī cult.¹

The ninth day of the bright fortnight of Āśvina was, generally speaking, sacred to the Devī, and nearly always the navamī cult is brought into relation with the king and his surroundings. We may refer, for instance, to Viṣṇudharmottarapurāṇa (Khanda II, chap. 158), which prescribes the worship of Bhadrakālī and that of the royal insignia and arms and weapons on that day: the goddess is worshipped by the king in a decorated pavilion near the barracks (sibira), and he has to keep awake the whole night. Similarly, the worship of the goddess Cāmundā on the aforesaid tithi is prescribed in Skandapurāṇa, Prabhāsakhaṇḍa (chap. 242 of Prabhāsaśeṭṭhamāhātmya). The same text describes a great festival in honour of Yogeśvarī, a form of Durgā, commencing from the fifth night of the bright half of Āśvina, the main feature being the mystic presentation of a sword to the goddess, while on the ninth day, after the sacrifice of animals, the king at the head of his army leads a procession with the image of the goddess in a chariot (Ibid chap. 83). These and similar references help us to understand the nature of the Mahānavamī festival, which may be regarded as a magic rite for the success of the king in warfare, or perhaps as a quasi-military festival celebrated under the patronage of the king, and in which he actively participates. A statement in Devīpurāṇa (chap. XXII) seems even to suggest that the Mahānavamī rites were put forward as a kind of substitute for the ancient horse-sacrifice.² The allusion to Mahānavamī in Somadeva's Yasastilaka, corroborated by similar references in the Purāṇas, shows its popularity as a court festival; and it is mentioned also in Bāna's Harsacarita, Book VIII, which refers to the sacrifice of buffaloes on the occasion¹ Somadeva does not indeed speak of animal sacrifices in connection with Mahānavamī, and it is quite possible that they were sometimes omitted, specially when the festival was celebrated under the auspices of a court like that of the Rāstrikūtas, susceptible to the influence of Jaina ideas.

Mahānavamī is followed by Dipotsava or the Festival of Lights, corresponding to the modern Diwālī. The short description of it addressed to the king by a bard in Yasastilaka 3. 462-4 refers to the whitewashed palaces and the white flags and the rows of lights on the lofty terraces of the edifices of the city, and speaks of 'the women excited by gambling', the gaiety of courtesans, and the sweet notes of music² According to Padmapurāna (Uttarakhaṇḍa), the Dipotsava commences on the fourteenth day of the dark half of Kārttika, and importance is given to a ceremonial bath on that day followed by a salutation to Yama. The illuminations take place in the evening, temples, buildings, shrines, assembly-halls, stables and fortifications are decorated with lights as are also river-banks, tanks, gardens and gateways. Next day the king entertains the citizens in a large-scale reception, and the Dipotsava seems to have provided a suitable occasion for promoting cordial relations between the ruler and the ruled. The king is expected to gratify the various classes of people on the joyous occasion, the good men with courtesy and others with food and drink and the learned with conversation and the inmates of the inner apartments with presents of cloth, betel, flowers, camphor and saffron and various delicacies. The village headmen are rewarded with gifts, and money presents are made to the tributaries, while ornaments are distributed among troops, ministers and kinsmen. Seated on a raised platform, the king witnesses bull-fights, and reviews the assembled clansmen and the troops and the actors, dancers and minstrels. An interesting item is the ceremonial fastening of the Mārgapālī, a wreath of Kuśa and Kāśa grass with numerous streamers, to a pillar of the fort or a tree, under which are assembled the horses, elephants and the cattle to ensure protection against disease. During the night the people indulge in gambling, and at midnight the women of the city cast out Alakṣmī, the goddess of poverty, from their homes to the sound of drums and music. The most important item of the nocturnal festivities is the worship of the demon king Bali. He is painted in gay colours, with the Vindhya range in the background (?), within a circle on the floor, and worshipped with all kinds of lotus blossoms and with wine, flesh and varieties of food. The king, too, with his ministers and priests, worships Bali for a happy new year, and passes the night without sleep in company with actors, dancers and singers (Chap 122).

The Dipotsava depicted by Somadeva in Yasastilaka is a secular festival, and the Padmapurāṇa, too, emphasizes the prominent rôle played by the court and its entourage in the festivities. But the details given in the Purāṇa indicate also its religious aspect which it has not entirely lost even today. In Bengal, for example, the goddess Kālī is worshipped on the Dīwālī or Dīpānvītā night, while the Jains celebrate the festival of lights on the new moon of Kārttika as a commemoration of the nirvāṇa of Mahāvīra. The Dipotsava or Dīwālī, like the ancient Jewish festival of 'Light', called also Hanukkah 'Rededication,'¹ may be described as a secular festival with a distinctly religious background.²

The Padmapurāṇa (op cit), which calls the festival of lights Dīpāvalī or Dipotsava, designates it also as Kaumudī and gives the derivation of the name.³ The festival is also called Kaumudī in Vāmanapurāṇa 92. 58, which describes how it was instituted in honour of Bali after his imprisonment by Viṣṇu. But the Kaumudī, properly so called, was a festival of the moonlight, and so different from the Dipotsava or Dīwālī. Somadeva refers to the Kaumudī festival in Yasastilaka VII. 27,⁴ and it is also mentioned in

1 It was an annual eight-day festival instituted in 165 B. C. to celebrate the re-establishment of worship in the temple after the interruption caused by the persecution under Antiochus IV. The illumination of houses on every one of the eight evenings was a characteristic feature of the celebration. 'The illumination was originally solely domestic, later, lamps were lighted in the synagogues also.' Moore. Judaism, Vol. II, p. 50.

2 The earliest festival of lights seems to have been celebrated in Egypt with the cult of the goddess Neith of Sais, the capital of the Kings of the XXVIth dynasty, as recorded by Herodotus, II. 62. He says that, on the night of the sacrifice, lamps were kept burning in the open air round about the houses. These lamps were saucers full of salt and oil, the wick burning all night. The illumination took place not only at Sais but throughout all Egypt. Herodotus travelled in Egypt about 450 B. C.

3 'कुशब्देन मही देवा मुद हर्षे ततो द्रयम् । धातुले निगमैश्चैव तेनैषा कौमुदी सृता । कौ मोदन्ते जना यसाञ्जानाभावैः परस्परम् । दृष्टदृष्टाः सुखापन्नास्तेनैषा कौमुदी सृता । कुमुदानि बलेर्यस्या दीयन्ते तेन वण्मुख ॥ अर्थार्थं पाथिवै पुत्रं तेनैषा कौमुदी सृता ।'

4 The queen Rāmadattā is described as witnessing the celebration of the Kaumudī festival by the women of the city from a high pavilion (नगराङ्गनाजनस्य कौमुदीसृतास्य समवनालोक्तमानवा समबोत्सङ्गसमासीनया).

Uddyotanasūri's Kuvalayamālā which assigns it to the full moon of the autumn.¹ An earlier reference to the Kaumudī festival occurs in Āryasūra's Jātakamālā (XIII) in the story of Unmādayantī the city is decorated with flags and the ground bestrewn with flowers, songs, dance and music are in full swing, luxury goods are exposed for sale and the streets thronged by gaily dressed crowds. It is noteworthy that there is no reference to artificial illumination which is a characteristic of the Dīpotsava. The Kaumudī was, in fact, a glorification of the autumnal full moon. It was a popular festival, being also mentioned in Mudrārāksasa, Act III and Mālatīmādhava, Act VII, and seems to be identical with the Kaumudijāgara noticed in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra 1. 4. 42. According to the Jayamangalā commentary thereon, the latter festival took place on the full moon night of Āśvina, the chief amusements being swings and gambling. The festival is mentioned simply as Kaumudī in Kāmasūtra 5. 5. 11, and the commentary here explains it as Kojāgara, which is the same as the full moon of Āśvina.² It is probable, however, that it was also customary to celebrate the Kaumudī festival on the full moon night of Kārttika.³

A hymn to Sarasvatī which is also a benediction addressed to the king occurs in Book III (vv. 261-8), and is described as accompanying the dance that takes place in connection with the preliminary worship of the deities before the commencement of a play. One of the verses runs thus.

मानससरोविरिगतसितसरसिहस्थितेः सरस्वत्या । वरवर्णकीर्णकान्तिः पुष्पाञ्जलिस्तु रङ्गपूजायै ॥

“Let this handful of flowers, radiant with beautiful colours, offered to Sarasvatī, abiding on the white lotus beds emerging on the Mānasa lake, serve the purpose of rangapūjā or the ceremonial worship preceding a dramatic performance”

1 Ratnaprabhasūri's Sanskrit version, p. 133

2 It is probable that Kojāgara is a contraction of Kaumudijāgara in spite of the usual derivation Kojāgarthi. In Bengal and Assam the Kojāgara or the Kojāgarī Pūrṇimā is definitely associated with the worship of Lakṣmī on the full moon after the Durgā Pūjā celebrations usually in Āśvina. An all night vigil is recommended in honour of Lakṣmī, and the goddess is believed to ask at midnight. Kojāgarthi, 'Who is awake?' See the citations in Śabdakalpadruma under Kojāgara. For example, अश्विने पौर्णमास्या तु चरेज्जागरण निशि । कौमुदी सा समाख्याता कार्या लोकविभूतये ॥ कौमुद्या पूजयेद्धक्षीमिन्द्रमैरावत स्थिरम् । निशीथे वरदा लक्ष्मी को जागर्तीति भाषिणी । तस्मै वित्त प्रयच्छामि अक्षैः क्रीडा करोति य ॥ It will be seen that the full moon of Āśvina is referred to as Kaumudī.

3 See Dhruva's edition of Mudrārāksasa, Act III, Notes. In Mudrārāksasa, 3. 10 the Kaumudī is described as a pārvana vidhi, which is explained by the commentator Dhundhirāja as taking place on pārvana or the full moon of Kārttika. See Telang's edition, Kaumudī is explained as a festival in Kārttika in Trikāśaśeṣa 2. 3, 19.

The custom of rangapūjā, as described in Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra (chap. 3), is a very old one and illustrates the interconnection of art and religion in ancient India. In the Nāṭyaśāstra, however, rangapūjā is an elaborate process involving the worship of a large number of deities in the playhouse with various offerings, and Sarasvatī is merely one among them, but it is probable that in later times Sarasvatī alone was worshipped, and in any case Somadeva does not mention the worship of any other deity in the nāṭyaśālā. Further, according to Bharata, the item of Pūrvavaranga, an elaborate musical prelude consisting of songs and dances before the performance of a play, takes place after the rangapūjā proper is over. Somadeva seems to make a combined reference to both the items when he speaks of pūrvavarangapūjā, but the distinct mention of rangapūjā in the verse quoted above shows that he has in mind the customary worship preceding a dramatic performance in the Hindu theatre. In regard to the position of Sarasvatī in rangapūjā, Somadeva's verses in praise of the goddess in Yasastilaka are mainly in the nature of a benediction addressed to the king, and in the Nāṭyaśāstra also, after the formal worship of the deities in which Sarasvatī has her due share,¹ the preceptor of the dramatic art (nāṭyācārya) praises and greets the king and the dancing girls, and then utters a benedictory verse for the prosperity of the king in which the blessings of Sarasvatī and certain allied deities are prominently invoked.²

Sarasvatī is represented by Somadeva as white and seated on a white lotus. She is three-eyed (i. e. has an eye on the forehead), and has matted hair on the head, and the crescent for ear-ornament. She has four hands bearing different emblems: the dhyāna-mudrā (also called cintā or jñānamudrā), a rosary of Rudrākṣa beads, a book, and the varada-mudrā.³ Somadeva's description of Sarasvatī roughly corresponds to that found in authoritative texts like Śāradaṭīlaka, Īśānasvagurudevapaddhati and Prapañcasāra-tantra, except for minor variations in the distribution and character of the emblems. According to Śāradaṭīlaka 6. 4⁴ and Prapañcasāra 7. 3, for instance, the emblems are jñāna-mudrā, a rosary of Rudrākṣa beads, a jar of nectar and a book; while Prapañcasāra 8. 41 substitutes a lyre for the jñāna-mudrā. According to Īśānaśiva (Mantrapāda 18. 6), the emblems are varaḍa-mudrā, a rosary, a lyre and a book.

The cult of Sarasvatī seems to have been prevalent in the Kanarese districts in the age of Somadeva. There is an old temple of Sarasvatī at Gadag, in the Dharwar district, which, though small in size, contains some of the most elaborately carved pillars throughout the whole extent of Cālukyan architecture. It stands close to the eleventh century temple of Triakūṭeśvara, and might possibly be of the same date. Within the shrine is an image of Sarasvatī, seated cross-legged upon a high pedestal, which has a peacock depicted in the central panel below. Unfortunately, the image is mutilated, the four arms being lopped off at the elbows. Otherwise, it is a very finely carved example representing the graceful figure of the goddess, with the pearl strings around the neck and the jewelled band about the waist. The elaborate pile of curly tresses on the head is surmounted by a six-tiered coronet of jewels. Another image of Sarasvatī, of inferior workmanship, was found in the old Jaina temple at Lakkundi in the Dharwar district. It is a more complete example representing the goddess with four arms. 'In her right upper hand is an elephant goad or ankuśa. The right lower rests open, palm upwards, upon her knee, with a small petalled flower upon it. In the left upper hand she holds a folded book, while the left lower holds a citron.'¹ While the iconography shows divergence in details, the cult appears to remain the same.

Traces of a temple of Sarasvatī, older than that at Gadag, have been found at Aihole, the home of early temples in the Deccan. Close to the temple (No 9) in the field to the south of the village, there stood another temple, but all that remains of it now is the shrine doorway and the seat or throne of the image. As in the temple at Gadag, a peacock, with its crest and long tail, is sculptured on the front of the pedestal, which seems to be an indication that the temple was dedicated to Sarasvatī. 'It thus occupies exactly the same position with regard to the temple as the later temple of Sarasvatī does to the temple of Triakūṭeśvara at Gadag.'² In northern India, there is 'a famous temple of the goddess Sarasvatī, or Sārādā Devī' at Maihar, now a station on the railway between Allahabad and Jabalpur.³

Pilgrimage to the shrine of the goddess Nandā on the Himalayas, evidently on the peak now known as Nandadevi, is mentioned in Yasastilaka

1 Cousens Chalukyan Architecture of the Kanarese districts, pp. 25, 79, 110.

VII. 31.¹ The cult of this goddess is described in detail in Devīpurāṇa (chap. 92-93), and extraordinary merit is said to accrue from the difficult journey to the almost inaccessible shrine. The goddess is clad in white raiment, and has four hands, she is surrounded by numerous beautiful maidens who are eager to marry her devotees. A noteworthy feature of the cult is that respect for women is particularly enjoined on the worshippers of the goddess (ibid. 93 165 ff.). Nandā-tirtha is described in Devīpurāṇa as a Śaiva tirtha, and, as in Yasastilaka, the goddess is called Bhagavati Nandā (93. 22-24) ²

A city-goddess named Siddhāyikā, 'who inspired the confidence of many people', is mentioned in Book I.³ In Book IV there is a reference to the evil spirit Krtyā who kills her own worshippers ⁴. It may be noted that, according to Kāthāsaritsāgara 5. 121-2, Cāṇakya worshipped Krtyā with magic rites in order to bring about the death of king Nanda. Krtyā is mentioned also in Śivasvāmīn's Kapphīnābhyudaya Mahākāvya 3. 24, 28,⁵ composed in Kashmir in the ninth century. A reference to the six magic rites of the Tantric cult occurs in a verse in Yasastilaka, Book IV.⁶ According to Sārādātīlaka 23. 122 ff., they are sānti or cure of disease and the expulsion of evil spirits such as Krtyā, vasya or bringing others under one's control; stambhana or paralysing the activity of others, vidveśa or causing enmity between friends; uccātana or compelling one to abandon hearth and home; and māraṇa or killing. Each of these rites has a presiding goddess who is worshipped at the beginning, and the goddess Jyesthā seems to be connected with the process of vidveśa.⁷ A reference to Jyesthā occurs also in Yasastilaka 3. 118 wherein she is said to be worshipped with white lotus blossoms ⁸. Jyesthā is diametrically opposite to Laksmī, being the goddess of adversity (Alaksmī), and so called, because she is believed to have emerged prior to Laksmī during the churning of the ocean. Her legend is related in Īṅgapurāṇa (Uttarabhāga, chap. 6), and she is particularly associated with sinners and evil-doers and all those who are outside the pale of the Brahmanical religion.

The worship of Cupid was celebrated as a court festival in the spring amidst vernal sports, of which we have a lively picture in Yasastilaka, Book III.¹ A further reference to the festivities in connection with the worship of Cupid, in which the king participates, occurs in Book V.²

Certain beliefs and customs belonging to the sphere of popular religion are recorded in Yasastilaka. The moon of the fourth lunar day was believed to cause disputes.³ A dove alighting inside a house was supposed to forebode its destruction.⁴ A number of evil omens described in connection with Yaśodhara's journey to the temple of Candikā in Book IV, e. g. the trumpeting of a female elephant at the commencement of a journey, the braying of a donkey from behind etc. A shower of crested tadpoles on a house was an evil portent indicating destruction of wealth and prosperity.⁵ Elephants were supposed to be possessed by a spirit named Madapurusa, of terrible aspect, like lightning fire.⁶ Śrutasāgara in his commentary quotes a verse which enumerates the characteristics of Madapurusa he has sixteen hands, four jaws, red eyes and flaming hair.⁷

Among popular customs referred to by Somadeva may be mentioned that of āgyāveksana or looking into clarified butter in the morning to counteract the effects of evil dreams and obtain other salutary results. It was a practice observed by kings while Brāhmanas uttered blessings.⁸ The wellknown custom of nirāyana or ceremonial waving of lights was observed as part of the evening rites to ensure the well-being of the king. A quantity of salt, thrown into the fire, after whirling it over the king's head, was supposed to counteract the evil eye, and this was also accompanied by the ceremony of offering boiled rice to the goblins on the roadside. This seems to have been followed by the act of nirāyana proper, which consisted in revolving lights beside the king.⁹ It was also customary to perform the nirāyana ceremony in honour of the royal horses and elephants on special occasions like the coronation of the king.¹⁰

CHAPTER XVI

JAINA RELIGIOUS AND MORAL STORIES

A considerable number of independent stories occurs in Yasastilaka, Books VI and VII, their purpose being to illustrate diverse tenets of Jaina religion and ethics. The first series in Book VI is meant to illustrate the different aspects of Samyaktva or Right faith, while the second series in Book VII illustrates two of the Mūlagunas and the five Anuvratas. The stories, on the whole, belong to the sphere of religion and folklore, and form part of the body of Jaina narrative tradition, generally known as Kathānaka literature. Jacobi says 'The rise of the Kathānaka literature..... may be placed about the end of the first century A D. Its end is indicated by the time of Haribhadra who lived about 750 A D. For Haribhadra wrote Tikās on the Āvaśyaka and other Sūtras and Nirvyuktis and the Tikās form the fourth and last layer of the Kathānaka literature.'¹ Generally speaking, the stories incorporated by Somadeva in his work must be considered much earlier than the tenth century, and, as we shall see, several of them are actually found or referred to in earlier texts. Somadeva has thus no originality in respect of these stories, and his turgid prose is hardly suited to the treatment of such simple tales. His great merit is in bringing together so many ancient stories and elaborately narrating them by way of illustrating various teachings of the Jaina religion. He has, in fact, preserved for us a highly interesting collection of stories, which, from the standpoint of religion and folklore, is hardly less important than the story of Yaśodhara. Their literary interest is enhanced by the fact that they form a sort of independent story-book within the framework of the romance.

Some of the stories recorded by Somadeva are based on Brahmanical mythology, and may be called Jaina versions of Hindu tales. The story of the sage Viṣṇu is nothing but a Jaina adaptation of the story of the Dwarf Incarnation of Viṣṇu. Jamadagni and Renukā are well-known in Brahmanical mythology, the story of Vasu, as we shall see, is originally a Brahmanical legend. Perhaps the most notable of the stories preserved in Yasastilaka is an early legend, probably the earliest known, concerning the foundation of the once famous Jaina Stūpa of Mathurā.² Most of the stories illustrating the Anuvratas may be described as folktales. All the stories recorded in Books VI and VII are summarized below in the order in which they occur in Somadeva's work.

1 Jacobi. Introduction to Śhāvirāvalīcarita or Parīṣṭaparvan, p. vii.

2 See below (VII) and Chap. XVII.

I) The first story, in three sections, shows that without will-power, it is impossible to attain success in the practice of religion, and hints that ascetics of the Brahmanical faith lack in this essential quality. Two friends Dhanvantari, the son of a merchant, and Viśvānuloma, the son of a priest, were banished by the king of the city of Bhūmitilaka on account of various offences, and in the course of their wanderings they came to Hastināgapura. There Dhanvantari was initiated into the Jaina religion, and devoted himself to meditation under the Jaina discipline, while Viśvānuloma followed the Brahmanical faith and became an ascetic wearing a mass of matted hair. After their death they were reborn as gods under the names of Amitaprabha and Vidyutprabha respectively. One day the latter happened to boast about the superior status of Brāhmaṇa sages like Jamadagni, Mātanga and Kapiñjala, and both decided to descend to the earth to ascertain the truth. There in the Badarikā hermitage they saw the sage Jamadagni engrossed in rigorous austerities, his hair and beard white with age, and his body enveloped in a tangled mass of creepers, shrubs and ant-hills. Seeing him, the two gods assumed the form of a pair of birds, and having settled inside his beard, began to talk with each other. One of the birds said to his mate that he would have to go to attend the marriage of the bird-king Garuda, but would return without the least delay, if he spoke falsely, his sin would be as great as that of 'this' sinner of a sage. Jamadagni was angry to hear these words, and squeezed his beard with a view to punishing the birds, but they flew away and perched on the top of an adjoining tree. The sage recognised the birds to be a couple of gods in disguise, and asked them respectfully what sin he had committed. The birds cited two verses to the effect that one should renounce the world only after bringing children to the world. The sage was accordingly guilty of infringing the rule laid down in the Law-books, and should, therefore, marry and beget children. Jamadagni, on hearing this, exclaimed, 'That is quite easy', and went off to marry Renukā, the daughter of the king of Benares, his uncle, and in the course of time became the father of Paraśurāma.

With the fickle nature of Jamadagni is contrasted the steadfast purpose and resolution of two Jaina devotees. The two gods passed on to Magadha, and there saw Jinadatta, absorbed in meditation in a cremation ground on a dark Caturdaśī night. They commanded him to give up his meditation, and tried to intimidate him by conjuring up terrible scenes of a veritable war of the elements, with bursting rain-clouds, thunder and storm; and at the same time tried to cajole him out of his resolution by offering to grant various boons. Jinadatta, however, remained unmoved, and the two gods showed their appreciation of his courage and determination, by presenting him with a magic formula enabling one to travel through the air Jinadatta, in his turn, gave the formula to his pupil Dharasena, after having utilized it for the purpose of visiting the Jaina shrines on the Mountain of the gods.

Turning from the veteran Jinadatta, the two gods decided to try their tactics on a novice, recently initiated into the Jaina faith. They happened to see Padmaratha, the king of Mithilā, going to worship the Tirthamkara Vāsūpūjya on the very day of his initiation, and immediately began to disturb him by conjuring up various scenes of horror including certain tiger-shaped monstrosities. Unable to strike terror into his heart, they plunged him into a huge expanse of mud, but the drowning prince only said 'Salutation to Lord Vāsūpūjya!' The two gods then extolled Padmaratha's courage and fortitude, and took their departure.

The value of intrepid courage and resolution in the practice of religion is further illustrated in a sequel to the main story. Dharasena, who had received the magic formula for aerial travel from Jinadatta, began the perilous mystic rites necessary for its practical application amidst the nocturnal horrors of a cremation ground. The details of the rites are obscure, but the main item seems to have been the suspension of a swing from the branch of a banyan tree over a consecrated ground, bristling with numerous sharp arrows fixed in the earth with upturned points: the devotee was to mount on the swing and cut the arrows to pieces while uttering the magic formula. Meanwhile, Lalita, the misguided son of a king, who had turned thief, having been robbed of his patrimony by relatives, came out in the darkness, on the mission of stealing for his mistress a famous necklace belonging to the chief queen of the lord of Kuśāgrapura. He succeeded in his venture, but could not evade the police owing to the lustre of the necklace being visible in the darkness. So he threw away the ornament, and walking about in the outskirts of the city, came upon the scene of Dharasena's mystic rites. Seeing that Dharasena was hesitating to mount the swing, the thief questioned him about the procedure, and having acquainted himself with the sacred formula, boldly seated himself on the swing and cut off at one stroke the entire mass of arrows. As a result of his bravery, the thief acquired the magic powers longed for by Dharasena, and later became a Jaina ascetic and attained salvation on the mount of Kailāsa.

II) The sacrifice of personal ambition and self-interest for the sake of one's vow is illustrated in the story of Anantamatī, the beautiful daughter of the merchant Priyadatta, an inhabitant of Campā. On the eve of his departure for the Sahasrakūta shrine for the celebration of the Eight-day rites, the merchant sent for his daughter, and was told that she was playing the bride with her doll, while her maiden friends were singing nuptial songs. When Anantamatī appeared before the old man, he asked her in jest to take the vow of chastity rather than harbour thoughts of marriage. The maiden, however, took the vow very seriously. Once in springtime she came out to indulge in the pastime of singing in company with her maiden friends on the day of Cupid's festival, when she was seen by a Vidyādhara, travelling through the air, accompanied by his wife. Wishing to abduct her, the demi-god went back to his home, left his wife there, and then returned and flew away with Anantamatī. But his wife was quick to follow, and seeing her in a rage, he hastily dropped the maiden in a forest near Śāṅkhapura. There she was seen by a Kūṣāta hunter named Bhīma who took her away to his village. Failing to seduce her by persuasion, he decided on violence, but meanwhile, through the intervention of the sylvan deities, who admired the firmness of the girl, the house of the hunter caught fire, and the miscreant, seeing the danger, begged her to forgive him, and then left her on the slope of a mountain on the border of Śāṅkhapura. There she was found by a young merchant who had encamped with his caravan near by, but unable to seduce her with money, he made her over to a bawd in the city of Ayodhyā. The latter, failing to mislead the girl, presented her to the king of that region, who in his turn discarded her, being baffled by her constancy and the opposition of the presiding goddess of the city, who had marked her displeasure by doing harm to many of the king's subjects. Anantamatī then came to live in a shrine near the house of Jinendradatta, the husband of her father's sister. After some time her father, while on a visit to his brother-in-law, happened to see her engaged in austerities in the shrine, and proposed to marry her to her cousin Arhaddatta, the son of Jinendradatta. But she firmly rejected the proposal on account of her vow of chastity.

III) Lack of hesitation in the practice of one's religion, for example, in the exercise of piety, is illustrated in the story of king Auddāyana, famous for his philanthropic actions. In order to test his piety, a certain god assumed the form of a religious mendicant, a loathsome leper with stinking and decaying limbs, and came to the king's house and asked for food. The king received him with open arms, and personally waited upon and treated him to a sumptuous meal. Unfortunately the leper felt sick, and as he lay in a mass of vomitted food, the king raised and washed him with his own hands, wiped his body with a silken scarf, and solaced him with soft and kind words. The god then threw off his disguise, and took his departure after praising and honouring the king with divine presents

IV) Unsweiving allegiance to the tenets of the Jaina faith and the lack thereof are illustrated in the stories of Revatī and Bhavyasena respectively. A Vidyādhara prince, indifferent to worldly happiness, abdicated in favour of his son, and desiring to visit the Jaina temple at Mathurā, took leave of his guru Munigupta at Madura, 'the Mathurā of the south', and departed for the north with a congratulatory message from Munigupta to Revatī, the consort of Vaiṣṇava, king of Mathurā. Arriving at the city by air, the Vidyādhara decided to test the religious conviction of Bhavyasena, a learned Jaina teacher, and of the faithful Revatī. Assuming the form of a young student, he first appeared before Bhavyasena and expressed his desire to study grammar with him. One day while walking with his teacher in the outskirts of the city, the Vidyādhara, by his supernatural powers, covered the ground with young sprouts of corn, and, on Bhavyasena hesitating to walk over them, because in the Jaina scriptures the sprouts of corn were regarded as stationary creatures, the so-called student argued that they had no characteristic of life such as breath, and were merely transformations of earth, very like gems. Bhavyasena believed his words and walked over the sprouts, without questioning the validity of his assertion. Similarly, the Vidyādhara persuaded Bhavyasena to use a clod of earth for cleansing purposes by arguing that it did not contain any living creatures, as maintained by Jaina doctrine. Then he persuaded him to take water without first straining it through a cloth, as required by Jaina practice (in order to eliminate living creatures), his argument being that no such creatures were visible in the transparent water. In this way the Vidyādhara satisfied himself that Bhavyasena lacked inner conviction and tenacity of faith in the religion professed by him, he now realised why the sage Munigupta had neglected to address any message to Bhavyasena.

The Vidyādhara then proceeded with elaborate preparations to test the faith of Revatī, well-known for her whole-hearted devotion to the Jaina faith. He betook himself to the eastern quarter of the city, and there created a sensation by assuming the form of Brahman, seated on a swan, with all his characteristics and paraphernalia. The Vedic verses uttered by the latter were being eagerly listened to by a multitude of sages such as Mātanga, Bhṛgu, Bharata, Gautama, Garga, Pingala, Pulaha, Puloman, Pulasti, Parāśara, Marīci and Virocana. The Arts incarnate in the form of beautiful maidens were standing by, plying their fly-whisks, and the deep-voiced Nārada was acting as doorkeeper. Revatī heard of this extraordinary phenomenon, but remained indifferent for she knew that Brahman did not figure among the sixty-three Famous Persons recognised by the Jaina scriptures.

The Vidyādhara then appeared in the southern quarter of the city and attracted great attention by assuming the form of Viṣṇu, lying on the coils of the lord of serpents, and wearing a ruby crown surmounted by a large spray of Pārijāta blossoms. Brahman, seated on a lotus emerging from Viṣṇu's navel, was reciting the latter's thousand names; Indra and the goddess of wealth were caressing his feet, the captive wives of demons were waving fly-whisks; and Garuḍa was maintaining order among the assembled gods. The apparition displayed the usual emblems of Viṣṇu—the quoit, the conch, the lotus and the Nandaka sword. Reports of this strange phenomenon were brought to Revatī, but she evinced no curiosity, and said, "There are, indeed, nine Viṣṇus or Vāsudevas known as Aīdhacakravartins in Jaina lore, but they are no longer in existence, the one must, therefore, be a magician come to delude the people".

The Vidyādhara appeared next in the western quarter of the city and assumed the guise of Śiva, mounted on a gigantic bull, and accompanied by Pārvatī. The apparition was furnished with the usual equipment of Śiva—the drum, the bow, the sword, the axe, the trident and the club; and attendants such as Analodbhava, Nīkumbha, Kumbhodara, Heramba and Bhīṅgūrīti were paying homage to the deity. News of this strange incarnation of Śiva or Rudra came in due course to Revatī, but she took no notice of it and said, "There are, indeed, some Rudras mentioned in the scriptures as creating obstacles in the path of religious austerities, but they are dead and gone as a result of their actions; so this must be some one else who is disturbing the peace by his magical tricks".

The demi-god then resorted to the northern quarter, and appeared in the form of a Jaina Tirthamkara, seated on his throne in a marvellous audience-hall, furnished with perfumed chambers, pillars, tanks, gates, Stūpas, flags, incense, water-jars, and various other receptacles. There gods and mortals participated in magnificent festivities, and false Jainas like Bhavyasena were also celebrating religious festivals. The show, however, produced no impression on Revatī, who knew that the Jaina scriptures recognised only twenty-four Tirthamkaras, and the latter having attained salvation, the new impersonation must be the work of some adept in magic.

Unable to shake the faith of Revatī by any of these devices, the Vidyādhara at last revealed himself before her, and respectfully delivered Munigupta's message which she received with the utmost veneration and joy.

V) The necessity of guarding the reputation of one's religion is emphasized in the story of the thief disguised as a religious mendicant Yaśodhvaja, the king of Pātaliputra, had a son named Suvira, who, being without education and moral training, fell into evil company and became addicted to theft and adultery. One day, while on a visit to a pleasure garden, he came across a gang of thieves and gamblers, and announced a rich prize for any one of them who could steal a certain marvellous jewel from a Jaina shrine, located on the top floor of a seven-storied building belonging to the merchant Jinendrabhakta, an inhabitant of the city of Tāmalipti. One of the company, a notorious thief named Sūrya, declaring that it was an easy task for him, immediately started for the kingdom of Gauda to carry out his boast. On his arrival there he disguised himself as a religious mendicant, and attracted the attention of all and sundry by the rigour of his fastings and austerities. Gradually he succeeded in winning the love and confidence of Jinendrabhakta, and once when the latter was about to start on a sea-voyage, he invited the so-called ascetic to come and stay in his temple during his absence. After making some pretence of unwillingness, the dissembler accepted the offer, and soon after the departure of the merchant, he stole the jewel and slipped away at the dead of night. But the lustre of the jewel in the darkness attracted the notice of the watchmen, and, pursued by them, the thief entered the camp of the merchant in the outskirts of the city where he was halting for the night. The merchant was awakened from sleep by the shouts of the watchmen, and at once recognised his old acquaintance; but quickly realising that the accusation of theft against a Jaina ascetic would discredit the religion, he solemnly declared before the officials that he had himself given the jewel to the ascetic, a noble soul, who deserved their highest veneration and respect.

VI) The duty of strengthening the loyalty of one's fellowmen to the Jaina faith is illustrated in the story of Vāriṣena, the other-worldly son of Śrenika, the king of Magadha. Once on a dark night Vāriṣena was absorbed in deep meditation in a desolate cremation ground. Meanwhile, at midnight, a rogue named Mṛgavega stole a costly necklace belonging to a merchant's wife at the instance of his mistress, a courtesan named Magadhasundarī. Pursued by the police, he flung the necklace in front of Vāriṣena and disappeared under cover of darkness. The police, finding the necklace lying near by, suspected Vāriṣena of the theft and reported the matter to the king, who was inexorable in the dispensation of justice, and immediately ordered his son to be punished and tortured as a thief. Vāriṣena calmly suffered the indignities inflicted upon him, eliciting by his fortitude the praise and admiration of the gods, and soon after renounced the world and became an ascetic. Puspadanta, the minister's son, was his intimate friend from childhood, and Vārisena prevailed upon him to become an ascetic like himself. Puspadanta, however, found it difficult to forget his beautiful newly married wife Sudatī in spite of his vow. Twelve years rolled by, and still her memory haunted him day and night. Vārisena, fearing that he would one day renounce his vow and return to his wife, hit upon a stratagem, and paid a visit to his mother, the queen Celinī, accompanied by his friend. The queen received both of them cordially, and Vārisena asked her to send for her daughters-in law. They were soon ushered to their presence, resplendent in their dress and adornment, and lovely with the fresh beauty of youth. Vārisena then requested his mother to send for the wife of his friend Puspadanta, but during the long period of her separation from her husband, she had lost her beauty and youth, and when she appeared before them, her ugly, emaciated and worn out figure made a sad contrast to the charming ladies who were standing beside her. The sight was too much for Puspadanta to bear, and he asked for leave to depart. In this way Vārisena confirmed his friend in the resolution to maintain his vow, and both thereafter continued their austerities together.

VII) The king of Ahicchatra in the Pañcāla country had a learned priest named Somadatta. Once the latter's wife who was expecting the birth of a child expressed a great desire to partake of ripe mangoes at a time when their season had already passed. Somadatta accordingly went in search of mangoes, accompanied by his pupils, and entered the Kāldāsa forest where they saw a large mango tree overloaded with the ripe fruit, as a result of the mystic power of the sage Sumitra who lived under the tree.

Somadatta sent some mangoes to his wife with one of his pupils, but himself remained there spellbound by the teachings of the sage, renounced all worldly aspirations, and became an ascetic. He started austerities on the Nābhigiri mountain in Magadha, and his wife in due course gave birth to a male child and came to her husband with the baby, but finding him utterly indifferent and insensible to family ties, she left the child before him on the rocks and returned home. Meanwhile, a Vidyādhara prince named Bhāskara-deva, who had been ousted from his heritage by his younger brother Purandara, fixed his camp at Balavāhanapura and came with his wife to pay homage to Somadatta, while the latter was engaged in austerities. Taking pity on the child, they adopted him as their own and named him Vajrakumāra. Bhāskara-deva then worshipped the sage and left with the child for Bhāvapura.

Vajrakumāra grew up to be a youth possessing valour and courage, attained the rank of a Vidyādhara and married his uncle's daughter Indumati.

Once on the Himālayas he rescued Pavanavegā, the wife of a Vidyādhara prince, who was engaged in certain magic rites for attaining the power of assuming a multitude of forms, but was about to be devoured by the Mystic Force in the shape of a huge serpent Vajrakumāra ultimately married Pavanavegā, and succeeded in restoring his adoptive father to the throne by overthrowing the usurper Purandara. Later on, he visited Somadatta, his real father, who was then practising austerities at Mathurā, renounced the world, and became an ascetic

About this time at Mathurā there was an orphan girl who, according to a prophecy, was destined to be the chief queen of Pūṭikavāhana, the lord of that city. A Buddhist monk, who was acquainted with the prophecy, carefully brought up the girl in a monastery, and she was called in jest Buddhadāsī, 'Buddha's maidservant'. She grew up to be a beautiful young lady, and soon attracted the notice of the king of Mathurā, who won her hand by agreeing to make her his chief queen

Aurvilā, the first queen of Pūṭikavāhana, was in the habit of sending out a ceremonial chariot in honour of the Jaina Saviour on the occasion of the Eight Day's Festival at Mathurā, but the new queen, owing to her Buddhist affinities, used her influence with the king and sought to stop the practice and establish a new festival in honour of the Buddha. Alarmed at the machinations of her co-wife, Aurvilā approached the sage Somadatta and appealed to him to ensure the continuity of the festival of the chariot. Somadatta instructed his son and disciple Vajrakumāra to do the needful.

Vajrakumāra who had attained the supernatural powers of a Vidyādhara went up to the city of the Vidyādharas, and began to descend from the sky with a huge concourse of Vidyādharas, carrying flags and banners, gates, pillars and canopies, mirrors, white parasols and gold jars, and diverse materials of worship. Ladies were singing to the accompaniment of various musical instruments, there was merry-making by dwarfs, hunchbacks, dancers, bards and panegyrists, and charming maidens were carrying lights, censers, perfume and flowers. Decorated cars, chariots, horses and elephants formed part of the company. While the citizens of Mathurā thought that a multitude of gods was coming to take part in the worship of the Buddha, organised by the Buddhist woman, Vajrakumāra with the Vidyādharas took up his residence in the house of Aurvilā, and for eight days caused her chariot to go round the city. Then he erected there a Stūpa marked with the image of the Arhat, and the shrine has ever since been known as "Built by the gods" In this way the designs of the Buddhist woman were foiled and the glorification of the Jaina faith assured through the timely intervention of Vajrakumāra.

VIII) The next story is designed to illustrate the value of sympathy for one's co-religionists, and interesting as a Jaina version of the story of Bali and the Dwarf Incarnation of Viṣṇu Jayavarman, the king of the city of Viśālā in Avanti, had four ministers headed by Bali, all of whom were heretics. They were Śukra, a Buddhist; Brhaspati, a materialist, Prahlādaka, a Śaiva, and their elder brother Bali who was an expert in Vedic lore. Once the Jaina ascetic Akampana, while on a visit to the city, encamped in the public park, and the streets were crowded with citizens going to pay homage to the sage. Seeing this, the king, too, expressed his desire to visit and pay his respects to the sage, but the ministers sought to dissuade him by glorifying their respective faiths. Bali, for instance, extolled the Veda and the Vedic religion, while Prahlādaka emphasized the glory of Śiva and the Śaiva scriptures. Disgusted with the attitude of the ministers, the king mounted on an elephant and betook himself to the camp of the sage. Thereafter offering his salutations, he entered into conversation with the Sūri on religious topics such as the nature of heaven and salvation. Bali who had accompanied the king intervened with the remark that heaven was nothing but the mutual love of a maiden of twelve and a youth of sixteen, and there was no other heaven invisible to the human eye. The sage asked Bali if direct perception was the only proof admitted by him. On his replying in the affirmative, the sage asked him how in that case he would prove the occurrence of the marriage of his own parents or the existence of his forefathers. Bali was very much annoyed at this, and unable to hit upon a plausible reply, he abused the sage in indecent and insulting terms. The king did not say anything then and there for the sake of decency, but returning home, he banished Bali and his brothers from his kingdom on the pretext of some other offence.

Bali with his brothers took refuge in the country of Kurujāṅgala, and he became the chief minister of king Padma of Hastināgapura. There he won the gratitude of the king by vanquishing the latter's enemy Simhakīrti who had invaded the city. Bali then obtained the king's permission to set out on an expedition of conquest. Meanwhile, the sage Akampana, accompanied by a huge concourse of monks, had in the course of his wanderings arrived in the vicinity of Hastināgapura, and taken up residence for the rainy season in a large cave of the Hemagiri mountain. Bali, on his return from the expedition, came to know of the whereabouts of his old opponent and decided on revenge. By virtue of a boon conferred upon him by king Padma as a mark of gratitude for the overthrow of Simhakīrti, Bali obtained from the prince the entire sovereignty of the kingdom for a certain number of days, during which the king's authority was to be limited to his inner apartments. Balī then began the performance of an Agnihotra sacrifice with intoxicating substances near the camp of Akampana Sūri, with a view to causing annoyance and disturbance to the sage and his followers.

Meanwhile, in the city of Mithilā, a Jaina monk named Bhrājusnu, going out at night, inferred from an observation of the stars that somewhere ascetics were being subjected to maltreatment and oppression. Thereupon the head of the monastery with his supernatural knowledge ascertained the mischief being done by Balī, and asked a devotee named Puspakadeva, capable of travelling through the air, to go and request on his behalf the powerful sage Viṣṇu to counteract the evil. The latter, on receipt of the message, immediately proceeded to Hastināpura and appealed to king Padma to give the necessary protection to the oppressed monks, but the king pointed out that Balī, and not he, was reigning at the moment.

The sage Viṣṇu then decided on a crafty manœuvre. Assuming the form of a dwarf, he went to the place where Balī was performing his sacrifice, and began to recite verses of the Veda in a melodious tone. Attracted by his sonorous voice, Balī came out of the sacrificial pavilion and asked him what he desired. The dwarf replied that, having been robbed of his home by his relatives, he wanted only a slice of land measuring three steps, and on hearing this, Balī at once granted his desire. The sage then discarded the guise of a dwarf and began to extend his frame upwards and downwards and athwart, without any limit. He fixed one step on the foundation of the ocean and another in the sky, and not finding room for a third, placed it on Balī and sent him down to the nether regions.

IX) The evil consequences of drinking are illustrated in the following story. A wandering religious mendicant named Ekapād, arriving at the Vindhya forest from the town of Ekacakra on his way to the Ganges, fell in with a crowd of Cāṇḍālas, who were indulging in bouts of drinking and partaking of meat in the company of youthful intoxicated women. The Cāṇḍālas detained the mendicant, and declared that he must, on the pain of death, either drink wine or take meat or become intimate with a woman. The mendicant reflected that the eating of flesh was strictly prohibited in the Law-books, and so was union with a Cāṇḍāla woman, but wine was drunk in the Vedic sacrifice Sautrāmanī, and the ingredients of wine such as flour, water and molasses were quite pure. Thus thinking, he preferred to take wine, but under the influence of drink he joined in the merrymaking of the women; and feeling hungry, partook of meat, and soon passion compelled him to desire the company of one of the Cāṇḍāla women.

X) The next story illustrates the advantage of abstention from wine. In the city of Valabhī, a gang of five notorious thieves went out one night during heavy rain, and stole a large quantity of treasure. They, however, fell out while dividing the booty, but soon ceased to quarrel and indulged in drinking bouts. But drink made them quarrel again, and a free fight ensued, resulting in the death of all of them except Dhūrtīla. The latter was in the habit of taking a vow of abstention for one day whenever he happened to meet a pious ascetic, and that day he had taken a vow to abstain from wine. Dhūrtīla then felt disgusted with the world and shaved his head and became a monk.

XI) The following story is meant to show that even the desire to eat flesh is a sin. Saurasena, the king of the city of Kākandī, had taken a vow of abstention from flesh-eating, but gradually under the influence of the Brahminical faith he became greedy of meat, and secretly employed his cook Karmapriya to procure the flesh of all kinds of animals for his table. Preoccupation with his public duties did not, however, leave him sufficient leisure to satisfy his desire fully.

One day the cook Karmapriya, while in quest of game, died from snake-bite, and after death he became a huge whale in the ocean. The king, on his death, was reborn as a small fish living in the cavity of the whale's ear. The fish noticed that while the whale slept, opening his mouth, large numbers of aquatic animals used to enter the cavity of his throat and go out again. The fish pitied the whale for not being able to devour any of these animals, and said to himself that had he been as big as the whale he would have emptied the ocean of its animals. In the course of time the fish and the whale both died, and were reborn as denizens of hell with the power of remembering their past lives. While in hell the former whale said to the fish "It was but natural that I should have come here as a result of my sins. But how came you who merely lived upon the filth of my ear?" The fish replied "On account of my evil thought, more harmful than even the depredations of a whale!"

XII) The next story illustrates the merit of abstention from flesh. There was a Cāndāla named Canda in the town of Ekānasī in Avantī. One day in the outskirts of the town he put a jar of wine on one side and a plate of meat on the other, and standing in the middle, partook of both in quick succession, while he whirled round a leather thong and struck down birds flying over him. As a result, snake-poison attaching to the beaks of the birds dripped on to the wine, and contaminated the beverage.

Meanwhile two sages possessing the power of travelling through the air descended from the sky to give religious instruction to the people, and the Cāndāla approached and entreated them to assign a suitable vow to him. Thereupon one of the sages asked him to fix a rope in the intervening space between the plate of meat and the jar of wine, and said that the momentary abstention from either that would be caused in going from one extremity to the other would constitute a sufficient vow of abstention for him. The Cāndāla acted accordingly, and after helping himself to the meat, said that he would abstain from it until his return from the other end. He then went towards the wine-jar, drank the wine and died from the effects of poisoning. As a result of the merit accruing even from the momentary abstention from meat, the Cāndāla was reborn as the chief of the Yaksas in the world of these spirits.

XIII) The following story illustrates the consequences of malevolence. There was a fisherman named Mrgasena in Śrīsagrāma in Avantī. One day he entreated a famous sage to assign a religious vow to him, and he was accordingly advised to refrain from killing his first catch on that particular day. The fisherman cast his net and soon caught a huge fish, but remembering the vow assigned to him, let the fish go after attaching to it a strip of cloth for the purpose of recognition. It so happened that he caught the same fish five times in the course of the day, but on each occasion let it go without any harm. His wife Ghantā was furious to see him return home empty-handed in the evening, and as she shut the door against him, he had to pass the night outside, resting his head on the trunk of a tree. Mrgasena was bitten by a snake during the night and found dead in the morning. The wife who was now overwhelmed with grief committed suicide by entering the flames on the funeral pyre.

The story now goes on to narrate the rebirth of Mrgasena. Viśvambhara was the reigning king of Viśālā where lived the merchant Gunapāla, his wife Dhanaśrī and daughter Subandhu. As ill-luck would have it, the king asked the merchant to give his beautiful and accomplished daughter in marriage to the son of the court jester. Afraid of the disgrace resulting from such a marriage as well as the wrath of the king in case of refusal, Gunapāla fled with his daughter to Kauśāmbī, leaving his wife, who was with child, in the house of his friend Śrīdatta, a wealthy merchant. The sages Śivagupta and Munigupta happened to see Dhanaśrī in the house of Śrīdatta; and Munigupta having pitied the condition of Dhanaśrī, who was pale and weak and dejected, the other declared that in spite of her present troubles, she would become the mother of a son destined to be a merchant prince and the son-in-law of king Viśvambhara. The merchant Śrīdatta overheard the conversation of the two sages, and, burning with envy, he devised a nefarious plan. No sooner had the child been born than he spread a report that Dhanaśrī had given birth to a dead child. At the same time he secretly summoned a Cāṇḍāla and handed the child to him to be put to death.

The Cāṇḍāla was moved to pity by the beauty of the child, and instead of killing, he left him in a secluded place and went home. The merchant Indradatta, who was the brother-in-law of Śrīdatta, came to know about the child from some cow-boys, and as he was childless, he came to the spot and gave the child to his wife Rādhā to be adopted as their son. Then he celebrated great festivities as if a child had been born unto them.

Śrīdatta heard of the turn things had taken, and devised another plan to kill the child. He went to Indradatta and persuaded him to give him the custody of the child, 'his blessed nephew', whom he would bring up in his own house. Śrīdatta then made over the child to another Cāṇḍāla to be put to death.

The Cāṇḍāla, instead of killing the child, left him in a wood on the bank of a river, and there he was guarded by the cows grazing on the spot. In the evening the cowherds came, and, finding the child, reported the fact to the head of the settlement Govinda, who gave him to his wife and adopted him as his own son. The child grew up to be a handsome youth and was named Dhanakīrti.

One day Śrīdatta happened to come to the place in the course of his commercial transactions, and saw Dhanakīrti in the house of Govinda. He understood everything when he heard the story of the youth, and told Govinda that he had an urgent message to send to his son at home, and requested that Dhanakīrti might be sent as a messenger. Govinda agreed, and Dhanakīrti set out on his journey with Śrīdatta's letter, in which the merchant asked his son Mahābala to kill the youth immediately on his arrival. Dhanakīrti took rest on his way under a mango tree and fell fast asleep. A courtesan named Anangasenā, who was gathering flowers nearby, happened to see the youth and approached him while he was asleep, and seeing a letter suspended from his neck, took it and read it through. Cursing the merchant she substituted for it another letter addressed to his wife and son, in which he was represented as enjoining them to give his daughter Śrīmātī in marriage to Dhanakīrti. The latter woke up after the courtesan's departure, and on arrival at the merchant's house, he delivered the letter to Mahābala and his mother, and was duly married to Śrīmātī.

The strange news reached Śrīdatta who at once returned home and hatched another plot. He posted a hired assassin and a wicked priestess in a desolate shrine of the goddess Durgā in the outskirts of the city, and asked Dhanakīrti to go there at nightfall with some offerings for the idol. Dhanakīrti consented, but Śrīdatta's son Mahābala, seeing him going out alone in the dark, dissuaded him from the visit, as he was a stranger to the place, and offered to go to the shrine himself with the offerings. Dhanakīrti accordingly stayed at home, and Mahābala went and met with death at the assassin's hands in the shrine of Durgā.

Overwhelmed with grief at the death of his son, Śrīdatta communicated the whole story of his conspiracy to his wife, and asked for help to get rid of the unwelcome guest. She promised co-operation, and, taking a number of sweetmeat balls, black and white, mixed the latter with poison, and asked her daughter Śrīmatī to give them to her husband to eat, while the black ones were to be given to her father. She then went away to the river for a bath. Śrīmatī served the sweetmeat balls in her mother's absence, but by mistake gave the poisoned ones to her father, whose death was instantaneous, and followed by that of her mother, who in her grief committed suicide by swallowing some of the poisoned sweets.

Sometime after the death of Śrīdatta and his wife, Dhanakīrti who continued to prosper was one day seen by king Viśvambhara. The latter was struck with the beauty of the young merchant, and decided to give his daughter in marriage to him, thus fulfilling the prophecy made about Dhanakīrti even before his birth. His father Gunapāla, hearing reports of his continued luck and prosperity, now came from Kauśāmbī and met his wonderful son. The courtesan Anangasenā also came to see him.

One day the merchant Gunapāla, accompanied by Dhanakīrti and his family and Anangasenā and Śrīmatī, paid a visit to the sage Yaśodhvaja, and, after obeisance, entreated him to explain the mystery of Dhanakīrti's providential escapes from death and the continued success of his glorious career. The sage pointed out that Dhanakīrti was in his previous birth the fisherman Mrgasena, and he was now enjoying the fruits of the vow of non-violence which the latter had taken for a day. The courtesan Anangasenā was the fish whose life had been spared by Mrgasena on the day of his vow, while Śrīmatī was no other than Ghantā, the wife of Mrgasena, who had entered the flames after her husband's death. Having heard the story of their previous births, Dhanakīrti, Anangasenā and Śrīmatī, all three, took the vow of renunciation and became ascetics under the Jaina system of discipline, and attained a blessed state after death.

XIV) The following story illustrates the consequences of theft or rather breach of trust. Simhasena was the king of Simhapura in the land of Prayāga, and Rāmadattā was his chief queen. The learned Śrībhūti who had a great reputation for speaking the truth was his priest, and Śīdattā was the latter's devoted wife. A young merchant named Bhadramitra, on the eve of a voyage to Suvarṇadvīpa with other merchants, had left seven priceless jewels in the custody of Śrībhūti. Unfortunately, on the return voyage, Bhadramitra suffered shipwreck, but succeeded in reaching the shore by clinging to a floating plank. Having lost his friends and wealth, he was reduced to sore straits, and, arriving destitute at Simhapura, went to Śrībhūti and asked for the jewels entrusted to him. But the latter pretended not to recognise him and denied having received any jewels at all. When Bhadramitra persisted in demanding the jewels, Śrībhūti had him dragged to the king's presence, and, accusing him of calumny and defamation, had him repudiated by the king.

Not discouraged in the least, Bhadramitra climbed every night a tamarind tree which stood near the queen's palace, and regularly at dusk and dawn he kept shouting from the top of the tree that Śrībhūti refused to return his jewels, and if the accusation turned out to be false, he (Bhadramitra) might be tortured to death. One evening the queen Rāmadattā, while she was watching the celebration of the Kaumudī festival by the women of the city, heard the plaint of Bhadramitra and devised a plan to test the truth of the charge against Śrībhūti. She invited the latter to a game of dice with her; and, under her instructions, a maidservant went to his wife, and won her confidence by producing certain articles belonging to her husband, which he had lost in the game, and obtained from her the jewels on the pretext that he had sent for them. The ruse succeeded perfectly well and the jewels were immediately taken to the king.

The king mixed up the jewels with those in his treasury and sent for Bhadramitra, and when the latter arrived, he was asked to single out the ones belonging to him. Bhadramitra had no difficulty in finding them, and the king was at once convinced of the guilt of Śrībhūti, and lavishly praised and rewarded the young man for speaking the truth. The king then sent for Śrībhūti, and, after severely reprimanding him for his treachery, ordered that, by way of punishment, he must either swallow a certain quantity of cow-dung or submit to be roughly handled by a number of stalwart wrestlers, otherwise he would have all his property confiscated. Śrībhūti calmly accepted the latter alternative, and was turned out of the city, mounted on an old donkey and wearing a garland of potsherds. As a result of his sins, he was attacked with leprosy, and put an end to his life by entering the flames. He was reborn as a serpent, and after causing the death of many creatures, expired and became a denizen of hell.

XV) The following story illustrates the disastrous consequences of falsehood. Ayodhana was the king of Hastināgapura and his queen was Atithi. Sulasā was their daughter, and she had been betrothed by her mother to Prince Madhupīṅgala of Paudanapura even before her birth. The king, however, decided to hold a Svayamvara for her to choose a husband, and issued invitations to a number of princes including Madhupīṅgala and Sagara. The latter was the lord of Ayodhyā and sent a highly cultured nurse named Mandodarī and the priest Viśvabhūti to win over Sulasā before the Svayamvara took place. They came to Hastināgapura, and Mandodarī managed to become a teacher of the harem, and influenced Sulasā in favour of Sagara. The priest, on the other hand, ingratiated himself with the king and the queen, and created in their minds a dislike for Madhupīṅgala. When the Svayamvara took place and the suitors came, Sulasā under the influence of Mandodarī chose Sagara and not Madhupīṅgala as her husband.

Madhupīṅgala in his grief became an ascetic, and arriving at Ayodhyā in the course of his wanderings, happened to take rest at the gateway of Sagara's palace. The priest Viśvabhūti was at the time giving lessons in prognostics to his disciple Śivabhūti, who observed the mendicant and expressed surprise at the contrast between his physical characteristics and his wretched condition, and spoke disparagingly of the science they were studying. Viśvabhūti, however, explained to his pupil the story of Madhupīṅgala and how he had become an ascetic owing to his failure to win the hand of Sulasā who had preferred Sagara. Madhupīṅgala felt grievously insulted at these remarks of his old enemy, and when, after death, he was reborn as the demon Kālāsura, he vowed vengeance against Viśvabhūti as well as Sagara, and waited for a suitable opportunity to carry out his designs.

Viśvāvasu was the king of the city of Svastimati and Vasu was his son. The learned Kṣīrakadamba was the priest of the king and Parvata was his son. One day the priest was expounding the ethical principles of the scriptures to his disciples Vasu, Parvata, and Nārada, who was the son of the priest of another king. Two sages Anantagati and Amitagati happened to see them, and while the former expressed his admiration for the teacher and his disciples, the latter remarked that two of them were likely to reverse in practice the teachings of the sacred texts. The priest heard these remarks and interpreted them to mean that two of the group would go to hell and the two others to heaven. He thought it most unlikely that he, a pious man, would go to hell, while he was certain that Vasu would, for that was where princely power led to. He was not sure about the fate of Nārada and Parvata; so with a view to testing their virtue and intelligence, he created by magic two lambs and gave one to each of them, with instructions to kill the animals and eat the flesh at a place where no one could see him. Parvata took his lamb to a secluded enclosure behind the house of his father, killed it and roasted and partook of the flesh. Nārada, on the other hand, pondered over the injunction about a place where no one could see him, and concluding that there could be no place, whether in a town or in a forest, where one could be beyond the range of one's own eyes or the eyes of the gods or the omniscient minds of the great sages, he refrained from killing his lamb and returned it to his teacher.

After this incident, the priest Kṣīrakadamba renounced the world and became an ascetic, and died by fasting. After his death Nārada came on a visit to Parvata, his old friend and companion. One day Parvata was expounding the text ajam yastavyam to some pupils, and interpreted the word 'aja' as 'goat,' so that the text would mean 'Sacrifices should be made with the flesh of goats'. Nārada intervened and pointed out that their departed teacher had interpreted the word to mean 'grains three years old', and that was the correct explanation. Parvata disputed the truth and accuracy of this statement, and both agreed that they should request prince Vasu to act as umpire, and accept his ruling as final.

Nārada and Parvata then went to Vasu who received them cordially and undertook to give his decision on the morrow. Meanwhile, the widow of the priest Kṣīrakadamba, who was aware that he had interpreted the word in the sense mentioned by Nārada, betook herself to Vasu, and in her anxiety to save her son from disgrace, reminded the prince of a certain boon that he had promised to her, and demanded that he should now fulfil his promise, by bearing testimony to the truth of the interpretation put forward by Parvata. Vasu knew that Parvata's statement was wrong, and that he would go to hell if he supported him, but he was bound by his promise to Parvata's mother and decided to abide by his pledged word. Next morning Vasu came to his court and occupied his famous crystal throne, and on an appeal by Nārada to speak the truth, declared that Parvata's interpretation was the right one. Disaster followed this false declaration, for amid the lamentation of the citizens Vasu, as he was seated on his throne, went down to hell. Even now, at the time of the first oblation of the day, people say "Rise up, Vasu, ascend to heaven."

Nārada was deeply aggrieved at the turn events had taken, and, feeling disgusted with the world, became an ascetic and devoted himself to meditation. The citizens in their fury rushed upon Parvata, to whom they attributed the downfall of their king, and, after pelting him with stones, and mercilessly whipping him, drove him out of the city, half-dead, mounted on a donkey, and compelled to wear a wreath of potsherds round his neck. Parvata took refuge in a dense forest, and there on the bank of a stream he was seen by Kālāsura, who approached him and won his confidence by representing himself to be his father's friend Śāṇḍilya. Parvata told him his story, how after the death of his father he had been addicted to drink, meat and courtesans, and gave a wrong interpretation of the text ajām yastavyam knowing it to be false, down to his dispute with Nārada and its unhappy sequel.

Kālāsura consoled Parvata and asked him to take heart and join him in a new venture. He persuaded Parvata to insert in the Vedic texts injunctions sanctioning various sacrifices involving slaughter of animals, use of wine, and moral laxity and perversion. He then came to Ayodhyā, and in the outskirts of the city assumed the form of the god Brahman, and commenced a vast sacrifice at which Parvata acted as the Adhvaryu or officiating priest. Magic forms of sages like Pingala, Manu, Mataṅga, Marīci and Gautama recited Vedic mantras, while Parvata propounded the doctrine that the animals were created for sacrifices, and killing at sacrifices was not tantamount to killing, since sacrifices contributed to the good of all. Goats, birds, elephants, horses and other animals were accordingly killed at the sacrifice and their flesh offered as oblations in the fire. Kālāsura by his magic showed the slain animals as going about in heaven in aerial cars, and the phantom sages proclaimed the glory of the phenomenon.

The exploits of Kālāsura created a sensation among the people and attracted the notice of Sagara and Viśvabhūti, who were also induced by him to sacrifice animals and partake of their flesh. Kālāsura then reminded them of the wrong they had done him during his previous birth, and murdered both by throwing them into the sacrificial fire amidst the oblations. Parvata continued to kill numerous animals for sacrificial purposes, but Kālāsura disappeared soon after. Helpless and miserable without his friend, Parvata suffered and died and went to hell.

XVI) The story of Kadārapīṅga and Padmā is meant to illustrate the consequences of illicit passion. Dharsana was the king of Benares and Ugrasena was his minister. Pusya was the king's priest, and he had a beautiful young wife named Padmā. Kadārapīṅga, the son of the minister, was a misguided and dissolute youth, who one day saw Padmā, while walking in the streets with his boon-companions, and was at once enamoured of her. There was an old nurse named Tadillatā, and she was persistently implored by the young man to help him to fulfil his heart's desire. The nurse thought it advisable to consult Ugrasena about his son's request, but the minister who was in his dotage openly encouraged her in the evil project.

The nurse visited Padmā's house, delighted her with her conversation, and became very intimate with the young woman. One day after some preliminary remarks on free love, she described to her the young man's ardent love for her and the suffering caused by his passion. Padmā pretended to agree to the bawd's proposal, and the chances of the minister's son looked bright indeed.

Meanwhile, the minister Ugrasena who favoured the criminal intentions of his son devised a scheme to ensure the absence of Padmā's husband from the city, on a prolonged mission. He told the king that, in a cave near the Ratnaśikhanda peak of the Himālayas, there was a marvellous bird called Kimjalpa, variegated in colour, and capable of talking like a man, the possession of which had a magic effect on the fortunes of the lucky owner. He further suggested that he and the priest Pusya who knew the place might be sent in quest of the bird. The king dissuaded the minister from going owing to his great age, and ordered that the priest should undertake the journey alone.

While Pusya was preparing to start, Padmā explained to him the real motive behind the proposed expedition, and asked him to make a show of departure and return secretly at night and remain concealed at home. He followed the instructions of his wife, and one night, according to a pre-arranged plan, the bawd brought over the minister's son to Padmā's house and introduced the young man to her. She asked both of them to seat themselves on a sofa, cunningly placed over a deep pit; and as soon as they sat down, they fell headlong to the bottom of the pit, and there they remained imprisoned, living on the remains of boiled rice left over by the household.

After some time, Padmā made it known that her husband would arrive in a few days with the Kimjalpa bird and the female spirit, its mother. She then caused the young man and the bawd to be put in a cage, after their bodies had been painted with various colours and decked with the feathers of diverse kinds of birds. The cage was then removed to a wood near the city and left in charge of Pusya, who was dressed in travelling attire, as if he had returned from a journey. Padmā, meanwhile, dressed herself in a manner becoming a woman whose husband was abroad, and set out to receive Pusya in company with her girl friends, who were all talking about the 'exploit' of her husband. On the following day Pusya accompanied by his wife, proceeded to the royal palace with the precious load and asked the king to behold the Kimjalpa and the mother bird. The king scrutinized the pair, and saying that he could see only Kadārapinga and the bawd Tadillatā in the cage, demanded an explanation of the mystery. Padmā then recounted the whole story, and the king praised and honoured her with rich presents, and sent her home in a chariot drawn by Brāhmanas, expert in Vedic lore. As for Kadārapinga and his father Ugrasena, their shameful intrigue was proclaimed before the people, and they were banished from the city. The young profligate, after long suffering the consequences of his sin, died and went to hell.

XVII) The following story is meant to illustrate the sin of unlawful possession. In the city of Kāmpilya in the Pañcāla country there was a merchant named Sāgaradatta who was, in spite of his wealth, a notorious miser, and went to ridiculous lengths in effecting economies and avoiding expenditure. The king of the place, whose name was Ratnaprabha, desiring to build a pavilion for witnessing elephant-races, selected for the purpose the site of a ruined palace belonging to a former king, and ordered the debris to be cleared. The bricks of the delapidated palace were of gold, but as they had lost their lustre, the king took them for ordinary bricks and employed workmen to heap them together in another place for erecting a temple. The workmen while carrying the bricks happened to drop one of them on the roadside, and the miser, finding it there, took it home and put it at the place where he used to wash his feet. The dirt having been removed by the daily friction of his feet, the brick regained its original colour, and the miser, seeing that the bricks were of gold, bribed the workmen and acquired as many of the bricks as he could.

One day the miser had to go to the city of Kākandī where his sister's son had died, but at the time of his departure he gave instructions to his son Sudatta to collect the bricks in his absence in the same fashion as he had done. Sudatta was, however, above such meanness; and when his father, on his return, asked him how many of the bricks he had managed to acquire, he replied that he had done nothing of the kind.

The miser was shocked to hear this, and condemning his own feet which had taken him to the hated town of Kākandī, he mercilessly pounded them with a slab of stone. The king, who had come to know about these happenings, had the bricks scraped by artisans; and convinced that they were of gold, he ordered the confiscation of the miser's property and banished him from the city. Sudatta was, on the other hand, provided with capital to carry on his business, and his ancestral home was returned to him as a reward for his honesty. The miser, who was known as Pinyākagandha, 'one who smells of oil-cakes,' suffered on account of his sins and went to hell after his death.

Apart from the stories outlined above, there are allusions to certain popular tales in Book IV. The story of Kāñcamkā is cited to illustrate the inscrutable nature of women: she is said to have killed her husband, son and paramour, and then immolated herself on the funeral pyre of her husband¹. The story of the merchant's wife and Mūladeva, and that of

1 इहैव वात्स्यायनगोत्रजस्य पुत्री भृगोः काञ्चनिकेतिनस्त्री । पतिं च पुत्रं च विदुः च हत्वा भर्ता तु सार्वं दहनं विवेश ॥

Upādhyāyikā, although they are folktales, are mentioned by Somadeva along with wellknown mythological stories, and will be found in Chap. XVII. The following 'ancient tradition' cited in Book IV forms part of a popular tale related in the commentary.

यदर्थं च मही त्यक्त्वा जीवितार्थं च हारितम् । सा मां त्यजति निःस्नेहा कः स्त्रीणां बल्लभो नरः ॥

The story, as given by Śrutasāgara, is as follows. The daughter of the king of Pātaliputra was married by the son of another king, but soon after the marriage the father of the girl fell ill, and the sacrifice of the daughter was recommended by a Tantric teacher as the only means of the king's recovery. Hearing this, the husband of the girl fled with her to a forest where she was bitten by a serpent. The prince was about to commit suicide from grief, but the sylvan deities interfered and told him that his bride would revive if he gave her half of his life-span. He agreed and the bride at once came to life, and they both continued their journey and reached a town. There the prince fell asleep in a hospice, and meanwhile a fellow named Devakeśin enticed the girl away. When the husband woke up, he saw her entering the town with the man, and a quarrel ensued over the possession of the girl, who, however, claimed the stranger as her husband. Thereupon the prince demanded back the portion of the life-span which he had given her, and the wicked woman at once dropped dead. The bystanders having asked for an explanation of these strange happenings, the prince uttered the verse quoted above: 'She for whom I had renounced the earth and given away half my life left me without pity. Who can ever be dear to women?'¹

As we have already stated, several of the stories summarized above are met with in earlier works. The eight stories in Book VI meant to illustrate the different aspects of Samyaktva are, for instance, stock illustrations, and briefly referred to in Samantabhadra's Ratnakaraṇḍakasrāvakaścāra 1. 19, 20,² the stories being summarized in Piabhācandra's commentary on the work. They were thus wellknown in Samantabhadra's time, and that they are much earlier than Samantabhadra³ seems also certain. Kundakunda, who lived about the first century A. D., mentions, for instance, Bhavyasena, one of the principal characters of the fourth story of our collection, in Bhāvaprābhṛta (verse 52), the typical instance of a man who failed to become a true monk despite his knowledge of all branches of the Scriptures.⁴

3 Samantabhadra is believed to be earlier than the fifth century A. D. See Pt. Yugal-kisore's Introduction (in Hindi) to Ratna-karaṇḍaka-srāvakaścāra, p. 142.

4 अगाइ दस य दुणिण य चउदसपुव्वाइ सयलसुयणाण । पढिओ अ भव्वसेणो ण भावसवणत्तण पत्ते ॥

As regards the other stories, there is no doubt that the story of Sagara and Madhupingala with the intermediate one of Vasu, Parvata and Nārada is a very old one. The case of Madhupingala is referred to by Kundakunda in Bhāvaprābhṛta (verse 45)¹ The entire story including the episode of Vasu is narrated in detail in Vasudevahindī, a comprehensive Prākṛit prose romance earlier than the seventh century,² to illustrate the origin of what is politely called the 'non-Aryan' Vedas³ The episode of Vasu is as old as the Mahābhārata and appears to be the oldest portion of the legend. It seems to have been incorporated in the Jaina story owing to the lesson of ahimsā conveyed by it, and provides another instance of Jaina adaptation of Brahmanical stories. The original story as related in the Mahābhārata (Śāntiparva, chap. 335 ff.) is as follows

"Vasu was a great king of the Satya Age, also known as Uparicara, a disciple of Bṛhaspati and an ardent devotee of Viṣṇu, who worshipped the deity according to the tenets of the Sātvata or Pañcarātra system. An asvamedha performed by him was remarkable for the fact that no animals were killed in the sacrifice, the oblations being made with the produce of the forest. Once while travelling through the sky, he was asked to act as umpire in a debate, which took place between the gods and the sages about the interpretation of the word aya in the statement that sacrifices should be performed with ayas. The gods maintained that the word meant 'goats', while according to the sages, it meant 'grains of corn'. Vasu out of partiality for the gods, gave the decision in favour of the latter, whereupon the sages cursed and condemned him to a life in the nether regions. While living under the earth, Vasu was nourished by a stream of clarified butter poured for him by the priests as an oblation in sacrifices, which gave it the name of vasordhārā 'the stream of Vasu'. Advised by the gods, Vasu continued to worship Viṣṇu even in the nether regions, and favoured by him, he regained his freedom and ascended to Brahmaloḥa." The story of Vasu is also referred to in the Anuśāsanaparva 6. 34, where it is stated that he went to hell for speaking even a single falsehood. A variation of the story occurs in Matsyapurāṇa, chap. 143, where the lesson drawn is not so much the danger of falsehood as that of rash judgment in religious matters.

Jinasena I narrates in his Harivamsapurāṇa written in 783 A. D. several stories mentioned above: the story of Vasu, Nārada and Parvata in 17. 38 ff. and that of Sagara and Madhupingala in 23. 45 ff., the story of the sage Viṣṇu and Balī in 20. 1 ff. and that of the priest Śrībhūti and his punishment in 27. 20 ff. Some of these stories are found in the Brhat-Kathākośa of Harisena written in 931-32 A. D.

3 Book V (सोमसिद्धिर्भो)

A variation of the story of Vajrakumāra occurs in Hemacandra's Parīśīstaparvā (Canto XII), which, though later than Somadeva's Yasastilaka, used old materials. Here, too, Vajra appears in the role of defender of the Jaina faith against the Buddhist community, although the place and circumstances are different. Somadeva's account is doubtless of greater importance as being connected with a wellknown historical monument, the Jaina Stūpa of Mathurā. It will be interesting to compare it with the version recorded by Hemacandra.

"The king (of Purī) was a Buddhist, and so were part of the inhabitants, while the majority of them were Jainas. As the two rival sects were continually competing with each other, the Jainas, being richer than their rivals, bought up all flowers so that the Buddhists could get none to offer in their temples. But the Buddhists induced the king to issue a strict order that no flowers should be sold to the Jainas. In this calamity the latter entreated Vajra to help them, for the Paryusanāparvan was drawing near, when the laity used to worship the images of the Arhats with flowers.

Promising his aid, Vajra went through the air to the town of Maheśvara, and entering the park of Hutāśana he met the gardener Tadīt who was a friend of his. Feeling greatly honoured by Vajra's visit, the gardener inquired with what he could serve him, and being told that flowers were wanted, he promised twenty lakhs of flowers. Vajra ordered him to have them ready against his return, and then flew through the air to the Himālaya, and thence to the Padmahrada, the residence of Śrīdevī. There he met the goddess who held in her hand a lotus to worship the gods with, but she gladly gave it to Vajra when he asked for it.

Returning to Hutāśana's park he produced by magic a divine car, in which he placed the lotus given by Śrī and round it the twenty lakhs of flowers brought together by his friend Tadīt. Accompanied by the Jimbhaka gods in their cars, whom he had called up to attend him on his journey through the air, he travelled towards Purī. When he and his train were just above the town, the Buddhists believed that the gods descended from heaven to worship the Buddha images. But great was their disappointment when the celestial train landed in a Jaina temple. Never has Paryusanāparvan been celebrated with such splendour as then at Purī. The miracles just related induced the king and his subjects to embrace the Jaina faith."¹

The last but one story of the series, that of Padmā, is a tale of the trapping of a libertine by a chaste woman, and resembles the story of Vararuci's wife Upakośā and the plight of her lovers, recorded in Kathāsaritsāgara, Canto IV. As we have seen, the story, as related by Somadeva, is in the form of dramatic dialogues linked by narrative passages, and might easily be converted into a little play.²

CHAPTER XVII

MYTHS AND LEGENDS

JAINA LEGENDS OF MATHURĀ

Of the several legends recorded by Somadeva, that of the famous Jaina Stūpa of Mathurā is of outstanding interest, and narrated in detail in Yasastulaka Book VI, sections 17, 18.¹ It is wellknown that the ruins of the ancient Stūpa were discovered in the course of excavations at the Kankālī Tīlā standing in the angle between the Agra and Govardhan roads during the season 1889-90.² Somadeva gives an entirely different version of the story of foundation of the Stūpa from that recorded in Jinaprabhasūri's Tīrthakalpa, a work of the fourteenth century, and made known by Buhler many years ago. Somadeva is nearly four hundred years earlier than Jinaprabha, and probably records the earliest known version of the legend of the Stūpa, which was regarded as of divine origin as early as the second century A. D. An inscription of the year 79, engraved on the left hand portion of the base of a large standing figure of a Jina found in the Kankālī mound in the season 1890-91, records the fact that an image of the Tīrthamkara Aranātha was set up at the Stūpa, "built by the gods" (thūpe devanurmite) "The sculpture belongs to the Kushān period, and the mode in which the date is expressed shows that the year 79 must be referred to the era used by the great Kushān kings. This year 79 falls within the reign of Vāsudeva, one of whose inscriptions is expressly dated in the year 80." The important thing to note is that when the inscription in question was executed, "not later than A. D. 157 (79+78)", the Jaina Stūpa of Mathurā was already so old that it was regarded as the work of the gods. "It was probably, therefore, erected several centuries before the Christian era, and may have been at least as ancient as the oldest Buddhist Stūpa"³ According to Jinaprabha, the Stūpa was built by the goddess Kuberā for two Jaina saints named Dharmaruci and Dharmaghoṣa, and among the idols installed in its precincts the chief was that of Supārśvanātha. The Stūpa was originally of gold, but later encased in brick as a safeguard against pillage. In the eighth century it was repaired by Bappabhatti Sūri, and at his request provided with a stone dome by King Āma.⁴ According to Somadeva, on the other hand, the Stūpa was founded by the saint Vajrakumāra, son of Somadatta, during the reign of Putikavāhana, and there is no reference to its ever being made of gold

The Jaina Stūpa of Mathurā seems to have existed in Somadeva's time, as is apparent from his statement that "the shrine is still known by the name of Devanimita, "Built by the Gods"¹ It may also be noted in this connection that the colossal image of Pāśvanātha, seated in meditation, found in the Kankālī mound at Mathurā in 1889, and bearing an inscription dated Samvat 1036 or 980 A D.,² was possibly built and installed within Somadeva's lifetime The discovery of another colossal image of a Jina, also seated in meditation, at the same site, and bearing an inscription dated Samvat 1134 or 1078 A D.,³ gives evidence of the continuity of Jaina religious life at Mathurā sixty years after the sack of the city by Mahmud of Ghazni in 1018 A D As Dr. Fuhrer says, "these ancient temples were used by the Jainas during the greater part of the eleventh century, and their destruction happened in very late times".⁴ As regards the great Stūpa, its site is at present a bare flat mound without any semblance of an ancient edifice on its surface But a sculpture on a Torana lintel from the Kankālī Tīlā, now preserved in the Lucknow Museum (J 535), shows the Stūpa as being worshipped by Kinnaras and Suparnas (half birds and half men), and gives us an idea of the general appearance of the monument as it originally stood The reverse side of the lintel represents a procession probably on its way to the Stūpa (see illustrations) Vincent Smith describes the piece of masonry as the central portion of the lowest beam of a Torana archway in the railing round a Stūpa, and says that it may have belonged to the ancient Stūpa, and is certainly an early work, probably to be dated about 100 or 50 B C.⁵

The existence of Jaina temples at Mathurā, called Uttaramathurā to distinguish it from Dakṣinamathurā or Madura in the Pāndya country, is attested by another reference in Yasastilaka VI. 10⁶ Two temples were, in fact, discovered under the Kankālī Tīlā. In the Museum Report for 1890-91 Dr Fuhrer writes that an inscription, incised on an oblong slab, gives the name of the founder of one of the temples, and as its characters do not differ much from those used in the earliest dated inscriptions of the Indo-Scythic period, he infers that one of the edifices was built before 150 B. C.¹

The legend of the Jaina Stūpa of Mathurā, as recorded by Somadeva, is also important as throwing light on the rivalry between the Jaina and Buddhist communities at the epoch of the foundation of the Stūpa.² It is obvious from the legend that the Buddhist wife of Pūṭikavāhana sought to abolish the Jaina Eight-day festival at Mathurā and replace it by a celebration in honour of the Buddha. Her attempt was foiled by Vajrakumāra, and the foundation of the Stūpa bears testimony to the unhindered celebration of the great Jaina festival at Mathurā.

Legends relating to certain pious Jainas of Mathurā occur in Yasastilaka. That of Revatī, wife of king Varuṇa, famous for her unflinching devotion to the Jaina faith, is given in detail in VI. 11.³ In Book IV Somadeva refers to the story of Aṇhaddāsa, who, though a householder, showed the resolution of an ascetic, when he continued his meditation unperturbed even at the sight of the sufferings caused to his family by some hostile deities.⁴ Aurvilā, the pious Jaina wife of king Pūṭikavāhana of Mathurā, who had to contend against the machinations of her young Buddhist co-wife, figures prominently in the legend of the great Stūpa.

OTHER JAINA LEGENDS

In Book IV occurs a reference to the story of the sage Puruhūta of Pāṭaliputra, who was once a king, but had abdicated in favour of his son and become an ascetic. Even during his austerities he could not repress his martial spirit when he heard that his son was waging war against his enemies.⁵

In Book I Somadeva refers to the temptation of the monk Rathanemi who gave up his austerities on witnessing the performance of a nautch-girl.⁶ Rathanemi was the brother of the great ascetic Ariṣṭanemi, and his story occurs in Uttarādhyaṇasūtra, chap. XXII, but, in the latter text, he feels tempted at the sight of his brother's discarded bride Rājimatī at a lonely spot Śrutasāgara, on the other hand, in his commentary on Yasastilaka, says that Rathanemi was a teacher of the Digambara sect, and married a nautch-girl, a girl of the potter caste, and a princess in succession, and took also the religious vow as often. The story, according to Śrutasāgara, is found in a Kathākośa.

In Book IV Somadeva refers to the early Jaina legend of the burning of Dvārakā by the sage Dvaipāyana.¹ The episode is clearly mentioned in the Antagadadasāo, Book V, and the Harivamsapurāṇa of Jinasena I, composed in 783 A D, narrates in detail how the city was burnt to ashes by the sage, as a revenge for being assaulted by the Yādava young men under the influence of drink (canto 61). The name of the sage is Dīvāyana in the Ardhamāgadhī text and Dvīpāyana in the Harivamsapurāṇa. Two other Jaina legends are cited in Book IV to illustrate the view that the doing of something different from what one resolves or promises to do does not cause any harm, provided it is harmless to others. There is a scriptural tradition (pravacana) that a king of Mithilā named Padmaśatha once set out on a journey apparently to worship the pontiff Vāsūpūjya, but his real object was to become a leader of the Jaina church.² Similarly, a young merchant named Sukumāra, who wished to renounce the world, had promised to his mother that he would do so after passing a day with each of his five hundred wives, but carried out his resolution sooner on hearing from a sage that he was not destined to live long.³

NON-JAINA LEGENDS

a) Brahmā, Viṣṇu and the Śivaliṅga

The dispute of Brahmā and Viṣṇu about the extent of the Śivaliṅga is mentioned in a verse, quoted by Somadeva from an earlier text in Book V.⁴ The story is also referred to in Śrīharsa's Narsadhacarita 10.51 and narrated in detail in Skandapurāṇa.⁵ It is noteworthy that there are important sculptural representations of the legend. In one of the cave-temples of Ellora,⁶ Śiva is depicted 'inside a linga with flames issuing from the side of it. Viṣṇu is represented below on the right as Varāha the boar-avatāra, digging down to see if he can reach the base of the great linga, having failed to do so, he is also represented as worshipping it. On the other side is Brahmā ascending to discover the top of it, which he also failed to do, and stands as a worshipper”¹ Similarly, in a beautiful sculpture preserved in the Rajputana Museum, Ajmer, and assigned to the tenth or eleventh century, Brahmā with a long beard is represented as soaring upwards, and Viṣṇu as diving below, to explore the top and the base of the linga respectively. After their failure, Brahmā is shown as standing on one side of it and Viṣṇu on the other.²

b) ‘Necessity knows no law’

In Book IV Yaśodhara’s mother, in her plea for animal sacrifices for one’s wellbeing, says that ‘the great sage’ Gautama killed even his benefactor Nādiṅgha to save his own life, and Viśvāmitra killed a dog for the same purpose.³ Somadeva here tangles with two stories found in the Mahābhārata, Śāntiparva (section on āpaddharma). Gautama was really a degenerate Brahman who killed the divine crane Nādiṅgha, perceiving no other means of sustenance, despite the great favours conferred on him by the bird. He is severely condemned in the Mahābhārata for ingratitude. Viśvāmitra, on the other hand, partook of dog’s flesh in the house of a Cāṇḍāla, and yet incurred no sin, because he did so for the purpose of self-preservation during a famine. The story of Viśvāmitra feeding on dog’s flesh is also referred to in Manusmṛiti 10 108. It may be noted that Śrutasāgara in his commentary invents fanciful stories to explain these allusions.

c) Women and the practice of religion

A group of traditional stories (śruti) is referred to in the message of Amṛtamati to Yaśodhara in Book IV, bearing on the duty of women to accompany their husbands in the practice of religion. She cites the wellknown instances of Rāma and Sītā, Draupadī and Arjuna, Sudakṣiṇā and Dilīpa, Lopāmudrā and Agastya, Arundhatī and Vasistha, Renukā and Jamadagni. On the other hand, the danger of women engaging in religious austerities, however rigorous, unaccompanied by their husbands, is illustrated by the little known story of a Brahmin woman named Brahmabandhū, who, although she was fasting unto death, at Prayāga, was associated by scandal with a monk named Govinda.⁴

d) Effect of calumny

The evil that can be done by popular report, however false, is illustrated by another group of traditional stories (laukiki śrutih) in Book IV. It is said that the sage Brhaspati was once refused admission to Indra's council-chamber owing to a false accusation brought against him by a gambler in the city of Cunkāra. A monk named Cakrapāni was debarred from entering Benares, because a minstrel named Sajaka, having failed to obtain a share in his earnings, spread a report that the monk was in the habit of devouring children. An ascetic named Mārkaṇḍa was excluded from the hermitages of anchorites, because he lived among drunkards, even though he used to drink only water¹

e) Wisdom no bar to moral transgression

The above group of legends is followed by another, designed to show that even the wise at times commit offences, regardless of consequences. The crime of the sage Dvaipāyana is mentioned first. We are then told that Rāvana abducted Sītā, even though he was presumably acquainted with the story of Dāṇḍakya in the Nitiśāstras². The latter story occurs in the Rāmāyana, Uttarakāṇḍa, Chap. 80, 81, where it is related how king Danda and his kingdom were destroyed by the sage Bhāṅgava as a punishment for violating the latter's daughter Arajā. The legend of Danda is also treated in detail in Vāmana-purāṇa, Chap. 63 ff. and mentioned in Kāmasūtra 1. 2. 44.

The wellknown stories of Nahusa's insult to the sages and Brahmā's passion for his own daughter are next referred to. Then comes the story of how Vaisaruci carried a pitcher of wine for the sake of a courtesan.³ The source of the story is obscure, but it seems to be a variation of a legend recorded in Hemacandra's Parisiṣṭaparva 8. 87 ff., which relates that the poet took to drinking under the influence of a courtesan named Upakośā with fatal results for himself⁴.

f) Legends of female character

A group of legends is cited in Yaśodhara's soliloquy in Book IV to illustrate the fickle character of women, and how they defy all restrictions on their movements. After referring to the mythological stories of Ahalyā

1 'तथाच लौकिकी श्रुति — किल बृहस्पतिः सद्वृत्तोऽपि चुङ्कारनगरे लोचनाञ्जनहरेण कितवेन मिथ्याप्रवाददूषित शतक्रतुसभाया प्रवेश न लेभे । अलब्धशान्ताशेन तु षडक्रानाम्ना वाग्जीवनेन अयं भिक्षाभ्रमणव्याजेनार्थकान् सक्षयति इत्युपहतश्चक्रपाणिः परिव्राट् वाराणस्याम् । मधुपेषु मध्ये पीतपयाश्च मार्कण्डेनापमस्तापसाश्रमेषु ।' p. 138

and India, Pārvati and the Elephant Demon, and Chāyā and the Fire god (the former had been placed by her father in the custody of Yama who vainly put her in his stomach for safety), Yaśodhara cites two little known tales. The first relates to the wife of a merchant, who resorted to the expedient of putting on a single cloth with her, but could not thereby prevent her from committing adultery with Mūladeva. The second story is about a clever adulteress named Upādhyāyikā, the wife of a Brāhmaṇa teacher.¹ According to Śrutasāgara, the name of the husband was Garga and that of the woman Somasī.

The temptations offered by women are illustrated in Book I by the legend of how the austerities of Śiva were interrupted by the sight of the water-sports of the daughters of Dakṣa, those of Brahman by the musical performance of the nymph Tilottamā, those of Parāśara by the meeting of the fisherman's daughter, and those of Rathanemi (see above) by the dancing of a nautch-gul.²

g) Miscellaneous Stories

The legend of Jīmūtavāhana is referred to in a simile in Book I.³ The allusion to Rādhā and Nārāyaṇa in Book IV⁴ is of particular interest in view of the paucity of early references to the former, and shows that the Rādhā legend must be much earlier than the 10th century. It is noteworthy that both Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā are mentioned in Hāla's Gāthā-saptasatī 1.89.⁵ A woman named Rādhā appears in the story of Dhanakīrti in Yasastilaka VII.26. The antiquity of the name is shown by the fact that a woman called Rādhā is also mentioned in Lalitavistara, chap. 18, the famous Mahāyāna work, earlier than the ninth century.⁶ The ten Incarnations of Viṣṇu are referred to in Yasastilaka, Book IV.⁷ occurs in Milindapañha iv.2.18. A Dānava, to guard his wife, put her into a box,

QUOTATIONS AND REFERENCES

A remarkable feature of Somadeva's Yasastilaka is that it quotes or refers to a large number of earlier authors and works, many of them otherwise unknown or but insufficiently known. These references have thus a great chronological value, forming as they do a definite landmark in Indian literary history. There are indeed few writers who have enriched Kāvya literature with so great a variety of well-stocked scholarship as the author of our romance.

POETS

In Book IV Somadeva refers to the following poets as Mahākavis, and claims that their kāvyas testify to the great reputation of the Jaina religion. Urva, Bhāravi, Bhavabhūti, Bhartihari, Bhartṛmentha, Kantha, Gunādhyā, Vyāsa, Bhāsa, Vasa, Kālidāsa, Bāna, Mayūra, Nārāyaṇa, Kumāra, Māgha and Rājasekhara. These names are followed by a reference to what Somadeva calls 'the Kāvyaśāstra composed by Bharata', probably the 17th chapter of Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra which deals with 'the adornments of poetry' (kāvya-vibhūsanāni), figures of speech and similar topics.

While some of the above names are well-known, we know practically nothing about the others. Nārāyaṇa may be Bhattanāyana, the author of Veṇīsamhāra, but we cannot be sure about this. Kumāra is very probably Kumāradāsa, the author of Jānakīharana. The reference to Gunādhyā seems to suggest that the lost Bṛhatkathā was extant in the Deccan in the 10th century. The reference to Bhāsa is not clear, and may not have anything to do with the dramatist of that name. In any case, Bhāsa is again mentioned as a Mahākavi in a subsequent chapter (Vol II, p. 251), and the following verse quoted therein shows that he was a follower of the sensual aspect of the Śaiva cult ¹ इममेव च मार्गमाश्रित्याभाषि भासेन महाकविना—

येषा सुरा प्रियतमासुखमीक्षणीयं ग्राह्यं स्वभावललितोऽविकृतश्च वेषः ।

येनेदमीदृशमदृश्यत मोक्षवर्त्म दीर्घायुरस्तु भगवान् स पिनाकपाणि ॥

"One should drink wine and gaze at a beloved woman's face and assume a garb that is beautiful by nature and unspoilt ² Long live Śiva, the Exalted One, who discovered such a way to salvation" It may be noted that the verse occurs in the Pallava king Mahendravarma's Mattavilāsaprahasana where it is declaimed by a drunken Kāpālka, after salutation to Śiva.

Ms. A remarks विकाररहितं नम एव.

With regard to the other poets mentioned in Somadeva's list no early poet of the name of Kantha is known, but a writer named Kantha is cited several times as an authority on Sanskrit roots in Kṣīrasvāmin's Kṣīratanaṅgī.¹ Combination of grammar and poetry is not rare in Sanskrit literature, but we do not know whether this Kantha was also a Mahākavi. As to Uṛva, two of our Manuscripts (B and C) give the name as Utsavva, but the reading of the printed text is supported by the other two Manuscripts (A and D) which seem to read Ūṛva. There seems no doubt that Ūṛva is the correct reading which has also the merit of being adopted in Śrutasāgara's commentary. Ūṛva is probably the same as the poet Auṛva cited in Vallabhadeva's Subhāsitāvalī which attributes the following verses to him

अय्यद्धनान्धकारेऽथ प्राप्ते वर्षानिशाक्षये । शरत् प्रभातवेलेव प्रकाशमनयद्दिशः ॥

रिक्ता विषाण्डुरात्मानो निःशब्दाः प्रातलाघवाः । त्वत्सपत्ना इव घना न्यस्तचापा दिशो ययुः ॥

The second verse is evidently addressed to a king, and Auṛva seems to have been a court-poet.

Of the remaining poets, Bāna is mentioned in another place, the reference being to his Kādambarī.² Māgha, too, is mentioned twice, Yaśodhara being addressed as a Māgha in poetic appreciation.³ As regards Bhavabhūti, a reference to the plot of his Mālatīmādhava occurs in Somadeva's Nītvākyaṃrta (Yuddhasamuddesa).⁴ In Book V Somadeva quotes verses from two other poets about whom we know nothing. They are Grahīla, who sings the glory of Śiva, and Nilapata, who heaps scorn on those who deny themselves the charms of women to seek the bliss of salvation. The following two verses are by Grahīla

त्वच्छेफसोऽपि भगवच्च गतोऽवसानं विष्णुः पितामहयुतं किमुतापरस्य ॥ इति,

इति च ग्रहीलभाषितम् । (Vol. II, p. 55)⁵

The following verse is attributed by Somadeva to Nilapata (Vol. II, p. 252). इदमेव च तत्त्वमुपलभ्यालपि नीलपटेन—

3 'सुकविकाव्यकथानिदोहदमाध' Book II.

4 'अयं हि किल दूरसोऽपि माधवपिता कामन्दकीयप्रयोगेण माधवाय मालतीं साधयामास ।'

5 The second verse occurs in Puspadanta's Mahimnastotra. It is possible that Somadeva's remark ग्रहीलभाषितम् might simply mean 'an obstinate utterance,' as the verses in question are cited to illustrate certain alleged contradictions in the conception of Śiva. See Chap. VIII.

पयोधरभरालसाः स्मरविवृण्णिताधेक्षणा क्वचित् सलयपञ्चमोच्चरितगीतब्रह्मारिणीः ।

विहाय रमणीरमूरपरमोक्षसौख्यार्थिनामहो जडिमडिण्डिमो विफलभण्डपाखण्डिनाम् ॥

Nilapata seems to be the same as the poet Nilapatta cited in Saduktikarnāmṛta which quotes from him the following playful verse on the irony of Śiva's burning the god of love. It would seem that Nilapata or Nilapatta was a poet who laid stress on the pleasures of love.

अयं स भुवनत्रयप्रथितसयमी शङ्करो विभर्ति वपुषाधुना विरहकातरं कामिनीम् ।

अनेन किल निर्जिता वयमिति प्रियायाः कर करेण परिलालयन् जयति जातहासं स्मर ॥

The following verse is attributed in Book IV to Vararuci (p. 99)

प्राणाघाताञ्जिवृत्ति परधनहरणे सयमः सत्यवाक्य काले शक्त्या प्रदेय युवतिजनकथामूकभाव परेषाम् ।

शृष्णास्रोतोविबन्धो गुरुषु च विनतिः सर्वभूतानुकम्पा सामान्यं सर्वशास्त्रेष्वनुपहतविधि श्रेयसामेष मार्गः ॥

The verse is found in the Nūnaya Sāgara edition of Bhartrhari's Nṛisataka, but seems to be an interpolation. It is not included in Jivānanda's edition of the work in Kāvyaśaṅgraha, vol. II. Somadeva refers to Bhartrhari in the above list, and must have been acquainted with his work. It is hardly possible that he would have missed the verse in Nṛisataka if it had formed part of the text. The verse in question is put in the mouth of Vararuci in a story in Durgasimha's Kanarese rendering of the Pañcatantra, based on Vasubhāga's Sanskrit version of the work, but as the latter recension is no longer extant, it is difficult to say whether Somadeva borrowed the verse from Vasubhāga.¹

Two verses of Bhartrhari are quoted by Somadeva in Book V without mentioning their author, one from S'rngārasataka and the other from Nṛisataka, the printed text of the S'atakas showing slight variations.

स्त्रीमुद्रां क्षणकेतनस्य महती सर्वार्थसपत्नीं ये मोहादवधीरयन्ति कुधियो मिथ्याफलान्वेषिणः ।

फल कर्मायत्तं यदि किमपरैः किञ्च विधिना नमः सत्कर्मभ्यः प्रभवति न येभ्यो विधिरपि ॥

As pointed out elsewhere,² Somadeva quotes a large number of verses on the ministers of kings from various poets, but it is doubtful whether they are historical names. There is a similar reference to a poet named Ganapati in the verse quoted below.

वृत्तिच्छेदद्विदशविदुषः कोहलस्यार्थहातिर्मानगलानिर्गणपतिकवे शंकरस्याशु नाशः ।

धर्मध्वंसः कुमुदकृतिनः केकटेश्वर प्रवासः पापादस्मादिति समभवदेव देशे प्रसिद्धिः ॥

It is stated in the verse that the wicked minister Pāmarodara insulted the poet Ganapati. Śrutasāgara in his commentary takes Tridaśa, Kohala and Kekati also as referring to poets, but the verse mentions only Ganapati as a poet. We cannot but regard these names as fictitious, but it is noteworthy that there was actually a poet named Ganapati earlier than the tenth century. Rājasekhara praises him in a verse cited in Jalhana's Sūktimuktāvalī, which also quotes another verse wherein he is mentioned along with several well-known poets¹. Verses from Ganapati are cited in Saduktikarnāmṛta and Sibhāsītāvalī, and he seems to have composed a work named Mahāmōḍa.

The following verse is quoted by Somadeva from an unnamed work on poetics (3 274)

त्रिमूलक द्विषोत्थानं पञ्चशास्त्रं चतुश्छन्दम् । योऽगं वेत्ति नवच्छायं दशभूमिं स काव्यकृत् ॥

GRAMMARIANS

Somadeva says in Book I that the monks accompanying Sudatta expounded to their disciples the tenets of 'the Andia, Jainendra, Cāndra, Āpīsāla, Pāniniya and many other grammars'. The grammar of Pāṇini needs no comment, but the others are less familiar, and it is interesting to find that they were in vogue in the tenth century. About a century later, the Mulgund Inscription² of the reign of Someśvara I, dated 1053 A. D., refers to the erudition of the Jaina Muni Narendrasena in the Cāndra, Kātantra, Jainendra, Śabdānuśāsana and Andra grammars, and that of Pāṇini, and these were no doubt the standard grammars of the day. As late as the thirteenth century Bopadeva mentions at the beginning of his Kavikalpadruma eight ancient grammarians including India, Candra, Āpīsālī, Pāṇini and Jainendra, and says that he has composed his work 'after examining their opinions'. Samayasundara in his commentary on the Jaina Kalpasūtra 2 9 includes the Andravayākaraṇa and the Āpīsālīvyākaraṇa among the eighteen grammars mentioned by him; but while it may be assumed that the grammars enumerated by Somadeva were current in the Deccan for a few centuries after his time, it would be rash to draw any conclusion about the popularity of these ancient texts from late references occurring in a writer of the seventeenth century.

No work called the Andra grammar has come down to us, but the Kātantra system is believed to be derived from the Andra school, of which the traditional founder is the god Indra, who first appears in the rôle of a grammarian in the *Taittiriyaśamhitā*¹ In later times Indra is mentioned as the author of a grammar in Śrīhaisa's Narsadhacarita 10 135, and Cāndūpandita, who wrote a remarkable commentary on the poem towards the end of the thirteenth century, takes the reference to mean the Aindia grammar²

Tibetan tradition, however, speaks of an Indriavyākaraṇa by a grammarian named Indragomin, and it is said to have been prevalent among the Buddhists of Nepal³ The question requires further investigation

The Āpiśala referred to by Somadeva is the ancient grammar of Āpiśali earlier than Pāṇini who refers to him in the rule rā supyāpiśaleh Āpiśali's opinion is cited in connection with another rule in the Mahābhāṣya on Pāṇini 4 2 45,⁴ and we learn from the same work (4 1 14) that a Brāhmaṇa woman who studies Āpiśala, that is, the grammar of Āpiśali, is called Āpiśalā⁵ Occasional references to the tenets of the Āpiśala school are found in the Kāśikā and Jinendrabuddhi's Nyāsa thereon For example, we read in Kāśikā 6 2 36 आपिशलस्यापत्यमापिशलिराचार्यः । तेन प्रोक्तापिशलम् । अधीयते येऽन्तेवासिनस्तेऽप्यापिशलाः । आपिशलेर्वा छात्रा आपिशला इति आपिशलपाणिनीये शास्त्रे । Kāśikā 7. 3 95 while explaining the rule तुरुस्तुशम्यग सार्वावातुके says—आपिशलास्तुरुस्तुशम्यग सार्वावातुकासु छन्दसीति पठन्ति Jinendrabuddhi remarks—सार्वावातुकास्विति स्त्रीलिङ्गनिर्देशः स्त्रीलिङ्गस्य सार्वावातुकाशब्दस्यापिशलिना सज्ञात्वेन प्रणीतत्वात् । Jinendrabuddhi on Kāśikā 1. 3. 22 mentions another peculiarity of Āpiśali सकारमात्रमस्ति वातुमापिशलिराचार्यः प्रतिजानीते । तथाहि न तस्य पाणिनेरिव अस भुवीति गणपाठः । किं तर्हि । स भुवीति स पठति । स त्वागमौ गुणवृद्धौ आतिष्ठते । एव हि स प्रतिजानीत इत्यर्थः । References to Āpiśali's grammar are found also in writers of the Kātantra school, e g in Durgasimha's comm on the rule द्वितीयैनेन—आपिशलीयव्याकरणे समयादीना कर्मप्रवचनीयत्वं दृष्टमिति मतम् ।

The Cāndra grammar referred to by Somadeva is the work of the Buddhist Candragomin, and has been edited⁶ and assigned to the 5th century A. D.⁷ The Jainendra is the work of the famous Jaina philosopher and grammarian Pūjyapāda, also known as Devanandin He is said to have been the tutor of the Ganga king Durvinita who ruled about the end of the fifth century But a Jaina scholar named Nīlavadyapandita who was a spiritual adviser of the Cālukya king Vinayāditya (680-696 A. D.) is described in an inscription as the house-pupil of Pūjyapāda, and R. G. Bhandarkar has on this ground suggested about 678 A D as the date of the grammarian¹ It is possible, however, that there was more than one Pūjyapāda, and it is usual to assign the grammarian to the latter half of the fifth century It may be noted that of the two recensions of the Jainendra grammar that preserved in Somadeva's commentary Śabdārnavacandrikā composed in 1205 A D is the earlier and more complete.²

Somadeva refers to Pūjyapāda again in Book II The young prince Yaśodhara is described as being proficient in grammar like Pūjyapāda and in the science of logic like Akalamka³ We shall speak about Akalamka a bit later As regards Pūjyapāda, although he was no less distinguished for his philosophical and other writings, he was regarded as a grammarian par excellence, a founder of an independent grammatical system 'Like Pūjyapāda in grammar, like Akalamka in logic' became a sort of proverbial expression among later Jain writers The comparison occurs, for instance, in some of the Śiavana Belgola inscriptions An inscription dated Śaka 1037 describes (verse 30) a teacher named Meghacandra as

षट्कर्तृत्वकलङ्कदेवविबुध साक्षादय भूतले । सर्वव्याकरणे विपश्चिद्धिप. श्रीपूज्यपादः स्वयं ॥

Another teacher, Jinacandra by name, is called जैनेन्द्रे पूज्य(पाद) सकलसमयर्तके च भट्टकलङ्क (verse 23) in an inscription of about Śaka 1022. Similarly, in an inscription dated Śaka 1320 a teacher named Śrutamuni is called शब्दे श्रीपूज्यपाद सकलविमतजित्कर्तृत्वेषु देव (verse 40)⁴ The grammatical learning of Pūjyapāda is further attested by the citations from the Mahābhāṣya occurring in his Sarvārthasiddhi, one of the earliest commentaries on the *Tattvārthasūtra*⁵

A casual reference to the grammarian Patañjali, the author of the Mahābhāṣya, occurs in a metaphor based on word-play in Book VI, section 20: 'शस्त्रशास्त्रविद्याधिकरणन्याकरणपतञ्जले बले'.

NĪTISĀSTRAS

In Book III Somadeva describes Yaśodhara as having studied the Nītisāstras of Brhaspati, Śukra, Viśālākṣa, Parikṣit, Parāśara, Bhīma, Bhīṣma, Bhāradvāja and others⁶ None of these ancient works is now extant, but there is no doubt that they were available in the 10th century

The opinions of the followers of the schools of Brhaspati (Bārhaspatyāh) and Śukra (Ausanasāh) are cited several times in Kautilya's Arthaśāstra, and these two ancient writers on statecraft are often quoted in the Mahābhārata and other texts¹. A large number of quotations from Brhaspati in verse occurs in Lakṣmīdhara's Kṛtyakalpataṇu (Rājadharmakāṇḍa)² composed in the twelfth century, and as late as the fourteenth century, Candesvara quotes Brhaspati, Bārhaspatya, and the Nīti or Rājanīti of Śukra in his Rājanītiratnākara, but the work of Śukra quoted therein is not the same as the extant Sukranītisāra, which is believed to be a later compilation.

Another reference to Śukra occurs in Book II. The young prince Yaśodhara is described as proficient as Śukra in political science and the disposition of troops on the battlefield³. The Nītisāstra of Śukra seems to have paid special attention to the latter topic, as the Mahābhārata (Āśramavāsikaparva 7. 15) refers to the Vyūhas known as Śakata, Padma, Vajra and mentions in this connection the sāstra of Uśanas.

अथोपपत्त्या शकट पद्मवज्रं च भारत । उशना वेद यच्छास्त्रं तत्रैतद्विहितं विभो ॥

The subject is treated in detail in Kautilya's Arthaśāstra 10. 6, wherein the discussion opens with a reference to the classification of vyūhas according to Uśanas and Brhaspati⁴.

We know very little about the Nītisāstras of Parikṣit, Bhīma and Bhīṣma. With regard to the latter, the opinions of an old writer on politics named Kaunapadanta are cited several times in Kautilya's Arthaśāstra (1. 8 etc.), and as Kaunapadanta is an epithet of Bhīṣma, the two names might refer to the same author. The Nītisāstra of Parāśara seems to be different from the Dharmasamhitā of the same author. The opinions of Parāśara and the school of Parāśara are quoted several times in Kautilya's Arthaśāstra (1. 8, 15 etc.). An opinion of Parāśara is cited also in Kāmandaka's Nītisāra 8. 39⁵. An early reference to the Nītisāstra of Parāśara occurs in the Tantrāḥhyāyikā, the oldest recension of the Pañcatantra, which mentions the Nītisāstra of Manu, Brhaspati, Bhṛgu, Parāśara, Śāṅkayana and Cānakya (Book III).

We know a bit more about Bhāradvāja. The Nītisāstra of Bhāradvāja has to be distinguished from the Smṛti work attributed to the same author or possibly some other author of the same name. Most of the available data about Bhāradvāja have been collected by Kane,¹ who points out that he is mentioned as one of the writers on Rājāsāstra in the Mahābhārata (Śāntiparva 58. 3) and that his opinions are cited several times in Kautilya's Arthasāstra. It may be added that the opinion of a Bhāradvāja is cited in Kāmandaka's Nitisāra 9. 57.²

The following verses are quoted by Somadeva in Book IV from a work of Bhāradvāja, called Sādgūnyaprastāva.

अवक्षेपेण हि सतामसतां प्रग्रहेण च । तथा सत्त्वेष्वभिद्रोहादधर्मस्य च कारणात् ॥

विमानमात्रं मान्यानां विश्वस्तानां च घातनात् । प्रजानां जायते लोपो नृपतेश्चायुष क्षयः ॥

कथमिदमभाषत षाड्गुण्यप्रस्तावे भारद्वाज । (p 100).

The purport of these lines is that the king and the citizens of a state go to ruin if the good are dishonoured and the wicked held in esteem, if living beings are injured and injustice prevails, if those worthy of respect are insulted and the faithful killed. The influence of these ideas can be seen from the fact that they are amplified in the following verses of Kautilya's Arthasāstra (7. 5)

अवक्षेपेण हि सतामसतां प्रग्रहेण च । अभूतानां च हिसानामधर्म्याणां प्रवर्तनैः ॥ . .

अदण्डनैश्च दण्ड्यानां दण्ड्यानां चण्डदण्डनैः । अग्राह्याणामुपग्राहैर्ग्राह्याणां चानभिग्रहैः ॥ . .

उपघातैः प्रधानानां मान्यानां चावमाननैः . . । प्रकृतीनां क्षयो लोभो वैराग्यं चोपजायते ॥

क्षीणाः प्रकृतयो लोभं लुब्धा यान्ति विरागताम् । विरक्ता यान्त्यमित्रं वा भर्तारं घ्नन्ति वा स्वयम् ॥

Bhāradvāja seems to have advocated the rule of concord and harmony in the relations of a king and his subjects, and the verses in question are cited by Somadeva in support of the doctrine of ahimsā. The principle of non-violence is in fact enunciated in another verse of Bhāradvāja quoted in the anonymous commentary on Somadeva's Nītwākyaṃrta (Vyāsana-samuddeśa)

तथा च भारद्वाज —

नृणश्छेदोऽपि नो कार्यो विना कार्येण साधुभिः । येन नो सिध्यते किञ्चित् किं पुनर्मानुषं सहम् (?) ॥

We know nothing about the contents of Bhāradvāja's Sādgūnyaprastāva, but the name suggests that it dealt with the six gunas or principles of foreign policy. It is possible that this was the name of Bhāradvāja's work on politics or daṇḍanīti, of which sādgūnya, according to the Mahābhārata, formed the quintessence (Śāntiparva 59. 78, 79)³

3 षाड्गुण्यगुणसारैषां सास्रत्यत्रे महात्मसु ।

Somadeva seems to have utilized another verse of Bhāradvāja. Both in Nītvākyaṃrta and Yasastilaka (3. 23) he tells us that to confide the care of a kingdom to officials is to entrust cats with the guarding of milk नियुक्तहस्तार्पितराज्यभारास्तिष्ठन्ति ये स्वैरविहारसारा । विडालवृन्दाहितदुग्धमुद्रा स्वप्न्ति ते मूढधिय क्षितीन्द्राः ॥ In Nītvākyaṃrta we have मार्जारैर्बु दुग्धरक्षणमिव नियोगिषु निश्चानन्तरणम् । There is no doubt that the idea is based on the following verse of Bhāradvāja quoted in the anonymous commentary on Nītvākyaṃrta (Amātyasamuddeśa). तथा च भारद्वाज —

मार्जारैर्बिव विश्वासो यथा नो दुग्धरक्षणे । नियोगिना नियोगेषु तथा कार्यो न भूमुजा ॥

We shall now speak a few words about Viśālākṣa. He and Bhāradvāja are mentioned among the writers on Rājāsāstra in the Mahābhārata (Śāntiparva 58 2, 3). The Mahābhārata (ibid 59 80-82) relates a legend, according to which Śiva, otherwise known as Viśālākṣa, abridged a lengthy Nītiśāstra composed by Brahman, and this shorter version containing ten thousand chapters was known as Vaśālākṣa after Śiva. What is certain is that Viśālākṣa was an ancient writer on state-craft whose opinions are quoted several times in Kautilya's Arthaśāstra (1. 8, 17 etc.), Kāmandaka's Nītiśāra 8 28¹, and Viśvaṭpa's commentary on Yājñavalkya 1 328.² He is also mentioned in Candēśvara's Rājanītiratnākara.

The following quotation from Viśālākṣa occurs in Yasastilaka, Book III. 'नैकस्य कार्यसिद्धिरस्ति' इति विशालाक्ष (p 453). The maxim is incorporated by Somadeva in his Nītvākyaṃrta, chap 18, without acknowledgment. It is quoted also in Kautilya's Arthaśāstra 1 15 with a slight variation 'नैकस्य मन्त्रसिद्धिरस्ति' इति विशालाक्ष । A similar idea occurs in a quotation from Yama found in Lakṣmīdhara's Kṛtyalalpataṛu (Rājadharmakāṇḍa 15 70) नैक कार्याणि यः कुर्यात् सोऽत्यन्तं पाति मेदिनीम् ॥

The opinions of Viśālākṣa sometimes run counter to those of Bhāradvāja, to judge from the statements preserved in Kautilya. Bhāradvāja, for example, contrary to the above maxim, opines that the king should deliberate alone on secret matters of policy 'गुह्यमेको मन्त्रयेत्' भारद्वाज । Further, while Bhāradvāja recommends submission in the face of a superior enemy, Viśālākṣa recommends fighting with the combined strength of all one's forces, regardless of victory or defeat.³

'बलीयसामियुक्तो दुर्बल सर्वत्रानुप्रणतो वेतसधर्मा तिष्ठेत् । इन्द्रस्य हि स प्रणमति यो बलीयसो नमति' इति भारद्वाज । 'सर्वसदोहेन बलानां युध्येत् । पराक्रमो हि व्यसनमपहन्ति । स्वधर्मश्चैव क्षत्रियस्य युद्धे जयः पराजयो वा' इति विशालाक्ष । Kautilya 12 1.

3 See also Kane's paper in Journal of the University of Bombay (op. cit.)

There is another quotation from Viśālākṣa in Book IV 'चातुर्मास्येष्वर्धमासिकम्, दर्शपूर्णमासयोश्चात्रात्रिकम्, राजनक्षत्रे गुरुपर्वणि च त्रैरात्रिकम्, एवमन्यासु चोपहतासु तिथिषु द्विरात्रमेकरात्र वा सर्वेषामघातं घोषयेदायुर्वल्लग्नद्वयम्' इति कथमुपनिषदि वदति स्म विशालक्षः । The purport of these lines is that non-injury to all creatures should be proclaimed (by the king) during the four months of rains for a fortnight, during the New and the Full Moon for four nights, on days related to the constellation under which the king was born and on Samkrānti days for three nights, and similarly on certain inauspicious lunar days for one or two nights. Viśālākṣa is reported as making this statement in an Upanisad. The word seems to be used in its wider sense of 'secret doctrine' and Upanisad might simply refer to Viśālākṣa's Nītisāstra. We know, for example, that the Mahābhārata (Śāntiparva 103.40) uses the expression dandopanisad in the sense of 'secret application of force',¹ and Somadeva himself uses the word upanisad in the sense of 'secret' or 'mystery' in relation to the teachings of the Arthasāstra. He says, for instance, 'अर्थशास्त्र-विचारपल्लवकलोकप्रकाशितोपनिषत्सु परिषत्सु' (Book III) 'in assemblies where scholars expert in the discussion of the Arthasāstra revealed the mysteries (of that science)'.

The passage from Viśālākṣa's Upanisad cited above occurs in Kautilya's Arthasāstra 13.5 with slight modifications and omissions in connection with the restoration of peace in a conquered country चातुर्मास्येष्वर्धमासिकमघातं पूर्णमासीषु च चात्रात्रिकं राजदेशनक्षत्रेष्वेकरात्रिकम् । It is possible that the passage is adapted from the work of Viśālākṣa, just as certain verses of Bhāradvāja have also been amplified and incorporated in the text of the Arthasāstra.² In face of this, it is impossible to accept Śrutasāgara's identification of Viśālākṣa with the sage Piabhākara and explanation of Upanisad as Vedānta-śāstra.

Somadeva seems to borrow an idea from another old writer whom he does not mention, but who is cited in the anonymous commentary on his Nītwākhyāmṛta. Both in Yasastilaka (3.25) and Nītwākhyāmṛta he expresses the opinion that the troubles of the master are the opportunity of the servants, and says that just as physicians try to aggravate the illness of wealthy patients, similarly the officials of a king try to add to his troubles.

व्याधिबुद्धौ यथा वैद्यः श्रीमतामाहितोद्यमः । व्यसनेषु तथा राज्ञः कृतयत्ना नियोगिनः ॥

He says in Nītwākhyāmṛta वैद्येषु श्रीमता व्याधिबुद्धौ नादिव नियोगिषु भर्तृव्यसनादपरो नास्ति जीवनोपायः । There is no doubt that the above idea is based on the following verse quoted

1 Nilakantha says रहस्यदण्डः.

2 See above.

from an ancient writer named Raibhya in the commentary on Nītwākyaṃṛta (Svāmisamuddeśa). तथा च रैभ्यः—

ईश्वराणां यथा व्याधिर्वैद्यानां निधिरुतमः । नियोगिनां तथा ज्ञेयः स्वामिच्यवनसम्भवः ॥

Similarly, Somadeva seems to have adapted another idea from the ancient writer Atri, well-known as an author of Smṛti works. Somadeva says in Yasastilaka 3 230

एकामात्रे महीपाले नालं लक्ष्मीर्विजृम्भते । लतायास्तत्र का वृद्धिः शाखैका यत्र शाखिनि ॥

In Nītwākyaṃṛta (10. 82) he says. किमेकशाखस्य शाखिनो महती भवति च्छाया । The idea is based on the following verse quoted from Atri in the commentary on the above work. तथा चात्रिः—

यथैकशाखवृक्षस्य नैव च्छाया प्रजायते । तथैकमत्रिणा राज्ञः सिद्धिः कृत्स्नेषु नो भवेत् ॥

The following verse is cited by Somadeva in Book IV without mentioning the source. उक्तं च—

राज्ञि धर्मिणि धर्मिष्ठा पापे पापाः समे समाः । राजानमनुवर्तन्ते यथा राजा तथा प्रजाः ॥

The verse is quoted in the commentary on Nītwākyaṃṛta (Svāmisamuddeśa) and attributed to Vyāsa. It is cited from Vṛddha Cānakya in Bohtlingk's Indische Spruche.

The following two verses are also cited in Yasastilaka (3.258-9) without mentioning the source.

नेमिमेकान्तरान् राज्ञः कृत्वा चानन्तराक्षरान् । नाभिमात्मानमायच्छेत्तेता प्रकृतिमण्डले ॥

अष्टशास्त्रं चतुर्भूलं षष्टिपत्रं द्वये स्थितम् । षट्पुष्पं त्रिफलं वृक्षं यो जानाति स नीतिविद् ॥

The purport of the first verse is that a king desirous of supremacy should make himself the centre of the Circle of States, making the neighbouring kings and those living beyond his immediate neighbours the circumference of the Circle. Yaśodhara says that while considering the verse in an assembly of learned men, he discussed also the second verse which has a bearing on the composition of the Circle of States, and dealt with the entire system of arrangement and distribution of alien states. The second verse is a sort of synopsis of the various topics of the Nītiśāstras, and from the nature of the reference we should expect to find both the verses in the same text, but actually we find the first verse in Kautilya's Arthasāstra and the second in Kāmandaka's Nītiśāstra. The Arthasāstra 6. 2 cites the first verse with an important variant, reading arān for narān. The reading (spokes) completes the metaphor of the wheel, but does not materially alter the sense of the verse. As regards the second verse, it occurs in Kāmandaka 8.42, but we cannot be certain that Somadeva took the verse from the latter work, as Śamkarārya in his commentary on Kāmandaka cites the verse independently from Auśanas, that is, the Nītiśāstra of Sukra.

The following verses quoted anonymously in Yasastilaka 3.77 and Book VI, section 13, are found in Kautilya's Arthasāstra 10.6 and 3.1 respectively. तदाह—

एकं हन्यान्न वा हन्यादियुः क्षिप्तो धनुष्मता । प्राज्ञेन तु मतिः क्षिप्ता हन्याद्भगवानपि ॥

दण्डो हि केवलो लोक पर चेम च रक्षति । राज्ञा शत्रौ च पुत्रे च यथादोष सम धृतः ॥

The first verse occurs also in the Pañcatantra (Tantrākhyāyikā) 3.123. It occurs in a somewhat different form in the Mahābhārata (Udyogaparva 33.47).

एकं हन्यान्न वा हन्यादियुःको धनुष्मता । बुद्धिर्बुद्धिमतोत्सृष्टा हन्याद्वाङ्गं सराजकम् ॥

The following verse occurring in Yasastilaka (towards the end of Book IV) is found in Kautilya 5.6:

कालश्च सकृदभ्येति यं नरं कालकाङ्क्षिणम् । दुर्लभः स पुनः कालस्तस्य कर्म चिकीर्षतः ॥

The verse is found also in the Pañcatantra (Tantrākhyāyikā) 3.74, the latter text reading tena for tasya and ekīrsatā for ekīrsatah. The Pañcatantra seems to have borrowed the verse from Kautilya, as the preceding sentence स्वयमुपगता श्रीस्त्यज्यमानाभिपतीति लोकप्रवाद is a variation of Kautilya's स्वयमारुढा हि स्त्री लज्यमानाभिपतीति लोकप्रवाद. The real author of the verse seems to be Bhāradvāja, as both the verse and the sentence preceding it form part of certain opinions of Bhāradvāja which Kautilya here cites and subjects to criticism.

There are also a few verses in our romance which are clearly based on Kautilya's Arthasāstra. The following verse is one of three (3.106-108) which Somadeva represents as containing the essence of all the Arthasāstras. He says:

स्वस्मान्निज. परोऽन्यस्मात् स्व. परस्मात् परो निजात् । रक्ष्यः स्वस्मात् परस्माच्च नित्यमामत जिगीषुणा ॥

The verse is obviously based on the following verse found in Kautilya 9. 3:

परे परेभ्य. स्वे स्वेभ्यः स्वे परेभ्यः स्वत. परे । रक्ष्याः स्वेभ्यः परेभ्यश्च नित्यमात्मा विपश्चिता ॥

The following Nīti verse on the risks of hunting is cited in Book V:

स्तेनद्विषद्विषव्यालश्चापदप्रभवं भयम् । शर्मधर्मविरामश्च मृगयायां महीपतेः ॥

The verse seems to be based on Kautilya 8. 3: 'स्तेनाभिन्नव्यालदावप्रस्वलनभयदिज्जोहाः छुत्पिपासे च प्राणबाधस्तस्याम् ।'. The references of Somadeva to the Arthasāstra are of a general character, and he does not seem to refer to any particular Arthasāstra. Two such references have been mentioned above. Another occurs in the following Nīti verse cited in Book IV, which sums up a leading idea of the Arthasāstra: to outwit one's enemies and not to be outwitted by them (p. 152):

एतदेवार्थश्चास्व नित्यमभ्ययने कलम् । यत् परानभिसंधत्ते नाभिसंधीयते परैः ॥

A similar summing up occurs also in Manu 7. 180:

यथैन नाभिसंध्युर्मित्रोदासीनश्चक्रवः । तथा सर्वं संचिदभ्यादेष्ट सामासिको नयः ॥

The rise of Candragupta to power, though resourceless, through the efforts of a good minister is mentioned in a traditional verse (śruti) cited by Somadeva (3. 242). तथाच श्रुति —

दुर्योधनः समर्थोऽपि दुर्मन्त्री प्रलय गतः । राज्यमेकशरोऽप्याप सन्मन्त्री चन्द्रगुप्तकः ॥

The tradition is also mentioned by Somadeva in his Nītvākyaṃrta 10 4, wherein Viṣnugupta or Cānakya is referred to by name तथा चातुश्रूयत विष्णुगुप्तानुग्रहा-
दनधिकृतोऽपि किल चन्द्रगुप्त साम्राज्यपदमवापेति । The anonymous commentary on the above work quotes a verse from Śukra which contains the same allusion, vr̥hala (*vr̥sala*²) apparently referring to Candragupta. तथा च श्रुत —

महामात्य वरो राजा निर्विकल्प करोति यः । एकशोऽपि महीं लेभे हीनोऽपि बृहलो यथा ॥

Somadeva says in the course of a discussion in Yasastilaka 3. 86:

पुष्पैरपि न योद्धव्यं किं पुनर्निश्चितैः शरैः । तामवस्था गतानां तु न विद्मः किं भविष्यति ॥

He says also in Nītvākyaṃrta 32 30. पुष्पयुद्धमपि नीतिवेदिनो नेच्छन्ति किं पुन शस्त्रयुद्धम् । The anonymous commentary cites here the following verse from Vidura. तथा च विदुर —

पुष्पैरपि न योद्धव्यं किं पुनर्निश्चितैः शरैः । उपायः.....पूर्वं तस्माद्युद्धं समाचरेत् ॥

The verse is not found in the Viduraniti incorporated in Viramitrodaya (Rājanītiprakāśa) There is, however, no doubt that the verse adapted by Somadeva is an old one. Śrīharsa's Narsadhacārta 4. 81 refers to the idea thus:

अहह नीतिरवाप्तभया ततो न कुसुमैरपि विग्रहमिच्छति ।

Nārāyaṇa in his commentary quotes the line पुष्पैरपि न योद्धव्यं etc. and adds इति नीति .

The following verse is quoted in Yasastilaka, Book III, without mentioning the source. तथा चोक्तं शास्त्रान्तरे—

चारो यस्य विचारश्च राज्ञो नास्तीक्षणद्वयम् । तस्यान्धदुग्धवद्वाज्यं मन्त्रिमार्यारगोचरम् ॥

A reference to the Nītiśāstras in general occurs in Book I नीतिशास्त्रैरिव प्रकाशितशमयोगतीर्थोद्योगैः . The Tirthas are the eighteen agencies with whose help a king governs the state. Śrutasāgara says—उक्तं च—‘सेनापतिर्गणको राजश्रेष्ठो दण्डाधिपो मन्त्री महत्तरो बलवत्तारश्चत्वारो वर्णाश्चतुरङ्गबलं पुरोहितोऽमालो महामात्यश्चेत्यष्टादश राज्ञा तीर्था भवन्ति ।’

SMRTI WORKS

A considerable number of Smṛti citations occurs in Yasastilaka, but most of them are from Manu as shown below. Manu 3. 267–271 on the offering of various kinds of meat in the Śrāddha rites is quoted in Book IV.

तिलैर्द्वीहियवैर्माषैरद्भिर्भूलफलेन च । दत्तेन मासं ग्रीयन्ते विधिवत् पितरो नृणाम् ॥

द्वौ मासौ मत्स्यमासेन ग्रीन् मासान् हारिणेन च । औरज्रेणाथ चतुरः शाकुनेनैव पञ्च वै ॥

षण्मासांश्छागमासेन पार्षतेन हि सप्त वै । अष्टावेणस्य मासेन रौरवेण नवैव तु ॥

दश मासांस्तु वृष्यन्ति वराहमहिषामिषे । शशकूर्मस्य मासेन मासानेकादशैव तु ॥

सर्वत्सर तु गव्येन पयसा पायसेन वा । वार्ध्नीणसस्य मासेन वृषिर्द्वादशवाषिकी ॥

All the five verses are quoted also by Hemacandra in his Yogasāstra, Chap. II. Several verses of Manu (5. 39, 41-2) on the eating of meat and the killing of animals in sacrifices and other rites are quoted in Book IV.

यज्ञार्थं पशवः सृष्टा स्वयमेव स्वयंभुवा । यज्ञो हि भूत्यै सर्वेषां तस्माद्यज्ञे बधोऽवधः ॥

मधुपर्के च यज्ञे च पितृदेवतकर्मणि । अत्रैव पशवो हिंसा नान्यत्रेत्यब्रवीन्मनु ॥

एवं तेषु पशून् हिंसन् वेदवेदार्थविद्विज्ज । आत्मानं च पशुश्चैव गमयत्युत्तमां गतिम् ॥

The above three verses are quoted also by Hemacandra in Yogasāstra (op. cit.) Manu 5. 27, 32 and 56 are also quoted.

प्रोक्षितं भक्षयेन्मांसं ब्राह्मणानां तु काम्यया । यथाविधि नियुक्तस्तु प्राणानामेव चालये ॥

क्रीत्वा स्वयं वा ह्युत्पाद्य परोपहतमेव च । अर्चयित्वा पितॄन् देवान् खादन् मांसं न दुष्यति ॥

न मांसमक्षणे दोषो न मद्ये न च मैथुने । प्रवृत्तिरेव भूतानां निवृत्तेश्च महत् फलम् ॥

The following verse is cited in Yasastilaka Book VII, section 30.

ओषध्यः पशवो वृक्षास्त्रियञ्च पक्षिणो नरा । यज्ञार्थं निधनं प्राप्ता प्राप्नुवन्त्युच्छ्रिता गतिम् ॥

The verse corresponds to Manu 5. 40, but Manu reads tathā for narāḥ. Somadeva seems to have purposely substituted narāḥ for tathā to exaggerate the repulsive character of Vedic sacrifices. Certain verses on the duties and character of women are quoted from Manu (5. 155, 154 and 9. 14) in Book IV.

नास्ति स्त्रीणां पृथग्यज्ञो न व्रतं नाप्युपोषितम् । पतिं शुश्रूषयेद्यन्तु तेन स्वर्गो महीयते¹ ॥

विशीलः कामवृत्तो वा गुणैर्वा परिवर्जितः । उपचर्य स्त्रिया साध्व्या सततं देववत् पतिः ॥

नैता रूपं प्रतीक्षन्ते नासा वयसि सस्थितिः । विरूपं रूपवन्तं वा पुमानित्येव भुञ्जते ॥

The following two verses are cited by Somadeva in Book IV as 'old traditions' (पुरातन्यौ श्रुती).

पौत्रहत्याचलचित्तत्वाज्ञैः स्नेहाच्च स्वभावतः । रक्षिता यत्नतोऽपीह भर्तृष्वेता विकुर्वते ॥

यदर्थं च मही त्यक्त्वा जीवितार्थं च हारितम् । सा मां त्यजति निःस्नेहा कः स्त्रीणां वल्लभो नरः ॥

Of these the first is Manu 9. 15. The second is cited also in Pañcatantra 4. 47 which reads it somewhat differently:

यदर्थं स्त्र्यकुलं त्यक्तं जीवितार्थं च हारितम् । सा मां त्यजति निःस्नेहा कः स्त्रीणां विश्वसेनारः ॥

The following two verses on renouncing the world and taking to an ascetic's life are cited from Manu (6. 3, 6. 36), the first in Book IV and the second in Book VI, section 5.

संस्तप्य प्रपन्नमाहारं सर्वं चैव परिच्छदम् । पुत्रेषु दारादिक्षिप्य वनं गच्छेत् सहैव वा ॥

अधीत्य विधिवद्देवान् पुत्राश्चोत्पद्य युक्तिः । इष्ट्वा यज्ञे यथाकालं ततः प्रव्रजितो भवेत् ॥

The Manu text reads dharmataḥ for yuktataḥ and the second line as इष्ट्वा च शक्तितो यज्ञैर्मनो मोक्षे निवेशयेत्. The accompanying verse cited in Book VI, section 5.

अपुत्रस्य गतिर्नास्ति स्वर्गो नैव च नैव च । तस्मात् पुत्रमुखं इष्ट्वा पश्चाद्व्रजति भिक्षुकः ॥

1 Here the Manu-text reads the second line as पतिं शुश्रूषते येन तेन स्वर्गो महीयते.

is not found in Manu, and seems to be a subhāsita. It is cited in Bohtlingk's Indische Sprüche from a Vikramacarita and a Subhāsītārṇava.

The precept cited in Yasastilāla, Book IV (आत्मानं तत् रक्षेद्द्वारैरपि धनैरपि) is the second line of Manu 7. 213. The verse in question occurs also in Garudapurāṇa (Pūrvakhanda 109 1) The above citations are all anonymous, but a verse quoted in Book IV (p. 100) is definitely attributed to Vaiśvasvata Manu and found in the Manusmṛti (6 66)

भूषितोऽपि चरेद्धर्मं यत्र तत्राश्रमे रतः । समः सर्वेषु भूतेषु न लिङ्गं धर्मकारणम् ॥

It may be noted here that Kullūka reads dūṣitah for bhūṣitah, but the latter reading is found in Medhātithi and adopted by Jolly in his edition of Manu. The verse in question is found also in Agnipurāṇa 161. 11, which however reads शुद्धभाव for भूषितोऽपि

The following verse on the sufferings in hell of those who kill animals is cited in Book IV as a Purāṇic tradition (इति कथमपि पौराणिकी श्रुतिः)

यावन्ति पशुरोमाणि पशुगान्त्रेषु भारत । तावद्दर्षसहस्राणि पच्यन्ते पशुघातकाः ॥

A similar verse occurs in Manu 5. 38:

यावन्ति पशुरोमाणि तावत्कृत्वो ह मारणम् । वृथापशुघ्नः प्राप्नोति प्रेत्य जन्मनि जन्मनि ॥

Somadeva cites the following verse in Book VII, section 30.

महोक्षो वा महाजो वा श्रोत्रियाय विशस्यते । निवेद्यते तु दिव्याय स्रक्सुगन्धनिषिर्विधिः ॥

There is a similar verse in Yājñavalkya 1. 109 (Ānandāśrama ed.), but the second line in it is entirely different.

महोक्ष वा महाज वा श्रोत्रियायोपकल्पयेत् । सत्क्रियाऽन्वासनं स्वादुभोजनं सूर्यतं वचः ॥

The following verses are cited anonymously in Book IV. तदुक्तम्—

विमत्सरः कुचेलाङ्गः सर्वद्वन्द्वविवर्जितः । समः सर्वेषु भूतेषु स पतिः परिकीर्तितः ॥

आपन्नान् व्रतज्ञानं मन्त्रज्ञानं तथैव च । आपन्नान् गृहस्थस्य व्रतमन्वैस्तपस्विनः ॥

न स्त्रीभिः संगमो यस्य यः परे ब्रह्मणि स्थितः । तं शुचिं सर्वदा प्रादुर्मासुतं च हुताशनम् ॥ इति. P. 110

उक्तं च—

तिलसर्षपमात्रं यो मांसमश्नाति मानवः । स श्वभ्रात्र निवर्तेत यावच्चन्द्रदिवाकरो ॥

संदिग्धेऽपि परलोके त्याज्यमेवाशुभं बुधैः । यदि न स्यात्ततः किं स्वादुस्ति चेन्नास्तिको हतः ॥ P. 115

सर्षपाशेषु यत् पापमग्निना भस्मसात्कृते । तस्य चैतद्भवेत् पापं मधुविन्दुनिषेवणात् ॥ P. 116

The following verses are cited in Book IV as an illustration of alleged contradictory statements found in Smṛti texts. The first verse, for example, condemns the acceptance by Brāhmanas of food or livelihood from Śūdras, whereas the second verse permits Brāhmanas to accept even the flesh of animals killed by Cāṇḍālas, dogs and tigers for use in religious rites.

शूद्राश्च शूद्रशुश्रूषा शूद्रप्रेषणकारिणः । शूद्रदत्ता च या वृत्तिः पर्याप्त नरकाय ते ॥

तथा मांसं श्वचाण्डालकव्यादादिनिपातितम् । ब्राह्मणेन ग्रहीतव्यं हव्यकव्याय कर्मणे ॥ P. 113

With regard to the first verse, the Smṛtis of Angiras and Āpastamba (Chap 8) contain a statement very similar in tone.

शूद्राश्च शूद्रसंपर्कः शूद्रेणैव सहासनम् । शूद्राज्ज्ञानागमः कश्चिज्ज्वलन्तमपि पातयेत् ॥

As regards the second verse, the Prajāpatismṛti recommends the acquisition of meat for religious purposes from hunters, who, as a rule, belong to the lower strata of society. व्याधेभ्यो मेध्यमासानि ग्राह्याणि द्रव्यपर्ययै (verse 143). Further, the Bṛhat-Parāśarasamhitā 6. 328¹ holds that the flesh of animals killed by dogs and tigers is pure, and may be used in religious functions.

कव्यादैः सारमेयाद्यैर्हृत मृगादिमाहरेत् । एतच्छाकवद्विच्छन्ति पवित्रं द्विजसत्तमाः ॥

Somadeva refers in Book III to several ancient writers on Smṛti. The envoy of Yaśodhara is described as surpassing in intellect Pulaha, Puloma, Pālakāpya and Kātyāyana.² Of these writers Pulaha and Pulastya are, among the ten teachers of Dharma mentioned in a verse of Vṛddha-Yājñavalkya quoted in Viśvalūpa's commentary on Yājñavalkyasmṛti 1. 5, and mentioned also in a similar verse in Vṛddha-Hārītasamṛti 8. 3 Pulomā was a writer on politics, and his opinion is cited in Kāmandaka's Nitisāra 8. 21. Kātyāyana was a great jurist.³ The reading Pālakāpya in the above list is doubtful. It is not clear why a writer on elephants should be mentioned along with celebrated writers on Dharma. Besides, the four Manuscripts used by me read Pālakāpya, and even Śrutasāgara who reads Pālakāpya says that there may be a reference to two different names,⁴ so that we have to suppose the mention of two writers, Pāla and Kāpya. The latter is no other than Śukra, the great authority on rājanīti, but we know nothing about Pāla as a writer on Dharma or state-craft. It may, however, be mentioned that a writer named Pālaki is quoted in the anonymous commentary on Nitivākyaṃṛta 22. 2, but the quotation is about the eight weapons of a war elephant, and this Pālaki may turn out to be the same as Pālakāpya. On the other hand, there was an old writer on Dharma named Gopāla, who is mentioned in the Bṛhat-parāśarasamhitā of Suvrata (1. 14) and the Rājanītiratnākara of Candēśvara.

ELEPHANT-LORE

In Book II Somadeva refers to the treatises on elephant-lore composed by Ibhačārin, Yājñavalkya, Vāddhaḥ (v. r. Vāhaḥ), Nara, Nārada, Rājaputra, Gautama and other sages. The committee of experts appointed to examine and select an elephant for Yaśodhara's coronation is described as having mastered the treatises of these writers. None of their works is now extant, but it is remarkable that so many texts on elephants were available in the tenth century. Some of the names occur in a long list of sages who are represented as attending the court of Romapāda, the king of the Āngas, in Pālakāpya's Hastyāyurveda (Chap. I), an ancient work of which we have only an imperfect text in the printed edition. These sages are described in Pālakāpya as conversant with the ways of elephants,¹ and we find mentioned among them Gautama, Rājaputra, Bāskali (v. r. Vākvali, Vākpatī), Yājñavalkya, Nārada and Mātanga. The latter name might be our Ibhaçārīn, as the Mātangalīlā of Nilakantha, which summarizes this portion of Pālakāpya in the first Patala, calls one of the sages Mātangaçārīn, which is same as Ibhaçārīn.²

The nature of Somadeva's reference leaves no doubt that there were actual treatises on elephants attributed to Gautama, Yājñavalkya and Nārada, but it is not known whether these authors had anything to do with their namesakes in the field of Smṛti literature. As regards Rājaputra, he seems to be the same as the Rājaputra whom we know as a writer on politics from citations in the anonymous commentary on Nītivākyāmṛta. According to Kane,³ Rājaputra is cited also in Ballālasena's Adbhutasāgara, but Somadeva's reference to him is about two centuries earlier, and probably the earliest known, if we leave aside the occurrence of the name in Pālakāpya. Among later writers Mallinātha cites Rājaputra's treatise on elephant-lore in his commentary on Raghuvamśa 4. 39.⁴

In Book II Somadeva describes the young prince Yaśodhara as being proficient in elephant lore like Romapāda,⁵ to whom we have already referred. In Pālakāpya's Hastyāyurveda (Chap. I) he is stated to be the king of the Āngas, and we see him at his court at Campā, attended by a large number of sages, and worried by the problem of catching wild elephants. Then appears the semi-legendary figure of Pālakāpya, the great authority on the diseases of elephants and their cure, and throughout the rest of the work Romapāda is represented as the pupil of the famous teacher. According to the Hastyāyurveda, Pālakāpya was the son of a sage named Sāmagāyana and a female elephant who was no other than a nymph metamorphosed by a curse. The home of the sage was on the side of the Himālayas on the banks of the Lauhitya or the Brahmaputra, which points to north-eastern Assam where the river is still called Luit. From here Pālakāpya wandered to Campā in search of a favourite herd of elephants, which had been driven away by Romapāda and his troops in the absence of the sage. We are further told that, at the request of Romapāda, Pālakāpya decided to settle at Campā, and the king caused a hermitage to be laid out for the sage in the outskirts of the city. The tradition of Pālakāpya and Romapāda as teacher and pupil is recorded also in Agnipurāṇa, chapters 286 and 387. Nilakantha says in his Mātangalīlā 12. 29 that roman, according to the old teachers, means a lotus, and Romapāda was so called because his feet were marked with figures of lotuses.

PHILOSOPHICAL CITATIONS

Most of the philosophical citations are anonymous, and occur towards the end of Book V and in Book VI, sections 1 and 2. They have been considered in Chap. VIII and IX, and some of them are reproduced below. There are at least two quotations from the Upanisads. “न ह वै सशरीरस्य प्रियाप्रिययोरपहतिरस्ति । अशरीरं वाव सन्त न प्रियाप्रिये स्पृशत ।” Book V, p. 254.

एक एव हि सूतात्मा देहे देहे व्यवस्थितः । एकघानेकधा चापि दृश्यते जलचन्द्रवत् ॥ VI. 1

The first is from the Chāndogya Upanisad VIII. 12. 1. The second occurs in various texts, e. g., Brahmabīndūpanisad, Amṛtabīndūpanisad etc. with slight variations. Śaṅkara in his Bhāṣya on the S'vetāśvataropaniṣad 1. 8 quotes the verse from Vāsisṭha Yogasāstra.

The following definition of the fundamental doctrine of the Vedānta in Yasāstilaka VI. 1, namely, “यथा घटविघटने घटाकाशमाकाशीभवति तथा देहोच्छेदात् सर्वं प्राणी परे ब्रह्मणि जीयते” reminds one of Avadhūtagītā 2. 25 :

घटे निम्ने घटाकाश आकाशे लीयते यथा । देहाभावे तथा योगी स्वरूपे परमात्मनि ॥

Somadeva remarks in Book V (P. 254). कथं चेद वचनमजयम्—

समस्तेषु वस्तुष्वनुस्यूतमेकं समस्तानि वस्तूनि यं न स्पृशन्ति ।

वियद्वा सदा बुद्धिमद् यत्स्वरूपं स तिस्रोऽपलब्धिः स त्रितयोऽहमात्मा ॥

The verse occurs in the well-known Vedāntic text Hastāmālaka, commented upon by Śaṅkara, which declares the Self to be identical with intelligence. Printed editions usually read the second line as follows :

..... बुद्धमच्छस्वरूपं स त्रितयोऽपलब्धिस्वरूपोऽहमात्मा ॥

The following verses are cited in Book V (p. 252) in illustration of Buddhist doctrines.

The first verse is quoted also in Haribhadra's Anekāntaśāyapratīkā (p 33) and the second in Nyāyakāṇḍikā (p 279) Other Buddhist verses quoted by Somadeva are तदाह—

तदुक्तम्—

सतापारम्भः कुशनाशाय चेति ध्वस्तप्रज्ञाना पञ्च लिङ्गानि जाड्ये ॥

The following verses seem to be quoted from Asvaghosa's Saundarananda XVI. 28, 29 wherein the lines appear in a somewhat different order तदुक्तम्—

जीवस्तथा निर्वृतिमभ्युपेत क्लेशक्षयात् केवलमेति शान्तिम् ॥¹

The statement of the doctrines of the Laukāyatikas put in the Yaśodhara's mother in Book IV is taken almost verbatim from the ra I 2 25-30 Somadeva says “न धर्माश्चरेत् एष्यत्फलं वान् सशयितत्वाच्च । को ह्यबालिशो न कुर्यात् । वरमयं कपोतश्चो मयूरात् । वरं साशयिकाञ्चिद्दसाशयिकं कार्षापणम् ” इति महान् खलु लोके कक्रोलाहल । (p 12) It may be pointed out that Vātsyāyana reads am for pādaḡatam and simply says इति लौकयतिका

The following verse cited by Somadeva in VI 1 to illustrate the power of Bhāvanā to represent all things clearly is cited also by Anantavijaya in his commentary on Parīkṣāmukhaśūtra (Pratyaksoddeśa) तदुक्तम्—

पिहिते कारागारे तमसि च सूचिमुखाग्रनिर्भङ्गे । मयि च निमीलितनयने तथापि कान्तानन व्यक्तम् ॥

Patañjali's Yogasūtras 1 24–26 are quoted in VI. 1, 2

‘क्लेशकर्मविपाकाशयैरपरामृष्ट पुरुषविशेष ईश्वरस्तत्र निरतिशय सर्वज्ञबीजम्’ इति पतञ्जलिजल्पितम् । तदाह पतञ्जलिः—‘स पूर्वेषामपि गुरु कालेनानवच्छेदात् ।’

The following verse is quoted in Book V and VI. 1 where it is attributed to Avadhūta

ऐश्वर्यमप्रतिहत सहजो विरागस्तृप्तिर्निसर्गजनिता वशितेन्द्रियेषु ।

आत्यन्तिकं सुखमनावरणा च शक्तिर्ज्ञानं च सर्वविषय भगवंस्तत्रैव ॥ इत्यवधूताभिधानं

The verse is not found in the Avadhūtagītā. It is quoted and attributed to Avadhūta also in Anantavīrya's commentary on Parīkṣāmukhasūtra (op. cit.) A very similar verse is quoted from Vāyupurāṇa in Vācaspatimiśra's

1 Asvaghosa reads दीपो यथा निर्वृतिमभ्युपेतो नैवार्विणं गच्छति नान्तरिक्षम् । दिशं न काचिद्दिशं न काचिद् commentary on the Vyāsabhāṣya on Yogasūtras 1 25 It is cited also in Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali (Chap 5), and occurs in Īśvaragītā (Kūrmapurāna, Uparibhāga, 8 12).

सर्वज्ञता तृप्तिरनादिबोध स्वतन्त्रता नित्यमलुप्तशक्ति । अनन्तशक्तिश्च विभोर्विधिज्ञा षडाहुरङ्गानि महेश्वरस्य ॥
The verse occurs also in Śivapurāṇa (Vidyasvarasamhitā) 16 13 which reads the last two lines thus

अनन्तशक्तिश्च महेश्वरस्य यन्मानसैश्वर्यमवति वेद ॥

Avadhūta seems to have been a Śaiva philosopher The following verse is attributed to him in Śrīkumāra's commentary on Bhoja's Tattvaparakāśa 1 15 शक्तिद्वयं च भगवताऽवधूतपादेनोक्तम्—

बध्नाति काचिदपि शक्तिरलुप्तशक्ते क्षेत्रज्ञमप्रतिहता तव पाशजाले ।

ज्ञानासिना च विनिकृत्य गुणानशेषानन्या करोत्यभिमुख पुरुष विमुक्तौ ॥

Somadeva quotes a number of verses from little known Śaiva texts in Book V (pp 251, 255) तदाह—

प्रपञ्चरहितं शास्त्रं प्रपञ्चरहितो गुरु । प्रपञ्चरहितं ज्ञानं प्रपञ्चरहितं शिव ॥ तदाह—

शिव शक्तिविनाशेन ये बाञ्छन्ति नराधमा । ते भूमिरहिताद्वीजात् सन्तु नूनं फलोत्तमा ॥

अश्विवत् सर्वभक्षोऽपि भवभक्तिपरायणः । भुक्ति जीवन्नवाप्नोति मुक्तिं तु लभते मृत ॥

अदृष्टविग्रहाच्छान्ताच्छिवात् परमकारणात् । नादरूपं समुत्पन्नं शास्त्रं परमदुर्लभम् ॥ Quoted also in VI 2

भोग्यामाहुः प्रकृतिमृषयश्चेतनाशक्तिशून्या भोक्ता नैना परिणमयितुं बन्धवर्ती समर्थः ।

भोग्येऽप्यस्मिन् भवति मिथुने पुष्कलस्तत्र हेतुर्नीलग्रीव त्वमसि भुवनस्थापनासूत्रधारः ॥

The following controversial verse directed against the central conception of Śaivism is cited twice in Book V and in VI 2 तदुक्तम्—

वक्ता नैव सदाशिवो विकरणस्तस्मात् परो रागवान् द्वैविध्योदपरं तृतीयमिति चेत्तत्कस्य हेतोरभूत् ।

शक्त्या चेत् परकीयया कथमसौ तद्वानसबन्धतः सबन्धोऽपि न जायतीति भवतां शास्त्रं निरालम्बनम् ॥

The following verse quoted by Somadeva in Book V is cited from Lakṣmīdhara's Kṛtyakalpataru (Rājadharmakāṇḍa) XIV 160. तदाह—

विधिर्विधाता नियतिः स्वभावः कालो ग्रहश्चेश्वरदैवकर्म ।

पुण्यानि माऽग्यानि तथा कृतान्तः पर्यायनामानि पुराकृतस्य ॥

A reference to Kumārila occurs in Book V कथमिदमुदाहारि कुमारिलेन—

विशुद्धज्ञानदेहाय त्रिवेदीदिव्यचक्षुषे । श्रेय प्राप्तिनिमित्ताय नमः सोमार्धधारिणे ॥

It is the initial verse of Kumārila's S'loka-vārtika

The following verses are quoted from Jaina texts in Book VI, section 21 उक्ते च—

आसन्नभग्नताकर्महानिसंश्लिष्टशुद्धपरिणामाः । सम्यक्त्वहेतुरन्तर्बाह्योऽप्युपदेशकादिश्च ॥

उक्तं च—

अबुद्धिपूर्वापेक्षायामिष्टानिष्टं स्वदैवत । बुद्धिपूर्वव्यपेक्षायामिष्टानिष्टं स्वपौरुषात् ॥

दशमिध तदाह—

आज्ञामार्गसमुद्भवमुपदेशस्य सूत्रबीजसंक्षेपात् । विस्तारार्थाभ्यां भवमवपरमावादिगाढं च ॥

The second verse occurs in Samantabhadra's Āptamīmāṃsā. The third verse is from Gunabhadra's Ātmānusāsana, and explained by Somadeva in detail. Another verse from Gunabhadra's Ātmānusāsana is cited in Book VII, section 26 तदुक्तम्—

परिणाममेव कारणमाहु खलु पुण्यपापयो कुशला । तस्मात् पुण्योपचय पापापचयश्च सुविधेय ॥

Gunabhadra wrote towards the end of the ninth century, and it is remarkable that he counted as an authoritative writer by the middle of the tenth century. A reference to the great Jaina logician and philosophical writer Akalamka occurs in Book II¹. He flourished about the eighth century A. D.² and wrote Tattvārtharājyavārtikālakāra, Nyāyavimścaya and other works.

MEDICAL AUTHORITIES

In Yasastilaka 3 328 Somadeva refers to the opinions of several ancient medical writers about the right time for taking the principal meal of the day. They are Cārāyana, Nimi, Dhisana and Caraka.

चारायणो निशि निमि पुनरस्तकाले मध्ये दिनस्य धिषणश्चरक प्रभाते ।

मुक्तिं जगाद नृपते मम चैष सर्गस्तस्या. स एव समय क्षुधितो यदेव ॥

A casual reference to Caraka occurs also in Book VI, section 10 'अभिनवजनमनोद्वादन-वचनागदप्रयोगचरकमट्टारक' Nimi is a very ancient authority, being quoted in Caraka-saṃhitā (Sūtrasthāna, Chap 26). He is described as the king of Videha 'सप्त रसा इति निमिवैदेह, मधुराम्ललवणकटुतिक्तकषायक्षारा ।' Nimi is quoted also in Astāngahrdaya of Vāgbhata II,³ Ksīrasvāmin's commentary on the Amarakośa 2 5 28, Dalhana's commentary on *Susrutasamhitā*⁴ and other works. Cārāyana can hardly be called a medical writer. In Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra 1 1 12 Cārāyana is said to have treated the general section of the Kāmasūtra of Bābhavya Pāñcāla in a separate treatise. It is noteworthy that the opinion of Cārāyana referred to by Somadeva is actually found in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra 1 4 20 'साय चारायणस्य'. As explained in the Jayamangalā commentary, Cārāyana recommends eating in the forenoon and the evening and not in the forenoon and the afternoon, as advised by Vātsyāyana. A number of verses from Cārāyana is quoted in the anonymous commentary on Somadeva's Nitivākyaṃrta, but as they are on Nīti, it is difficult to say whether the two Cārāyanas are identical.

In Book II the young prince Yaśodhara is declared to be well-versed in the art of healing, like Kāśīnāja¹ Kāśīnāja is explained by the commentator as Dhanvantari. According to a tradition preserved in the Harivamśa (Paiva I, Chap 29), in the dynasty of Kāśa king Dhanva had a son named Dhanvantari, said to be an incarnation of the divine physician of that name on account of his knowledge of medical lore. In the same line of kings Divodāsa came two generations after Dhanvantari, and it is remarkable that at the beginning of the Susruta-saṃhitā Suśruta and other sages are described as being instructed in medical lore by Divodāsa Dhanvantari, the king of Benares अथ खलु भगवन्तममरवरसृषिगणपरिवृतमाश्रमस्थ काशिराज दिवोदासधन्वन्तरिमौपधेनव सुश्रुतप्रभृतय ऊचुः । 'Dhanvantari' is here explained by Dalhana as 'an expert in surgery,'² and it is clear that Divodāsa, like his ancestor, was an expert in the art of healing and had the epithet Dhanvantari attached to his name. Divodāsa is described in the Harivamśa (op cit., verse 29) as the king of Benares and in the Mahābhārata (Anusāsanaparva 30 16 Cal ed) he is said to have founded the city. It appears that an ancient line of kings ruled in the country round about Benares, and both Dhanvantari and Divodāsa belonging to this dynasty were famous as medical authorities and known as Kāśīrāja. The Harivamśa (op cit, verses 26-7) tells us that Kāśīnāja Dhanvantari learnt the Āyurveda from Bhāradvāja, and dividing it into eight sections taught them to his disciples.

तस्य गेहे समुत्पन्नो देवो धन्वन्तरिस्तदा । काशिराजो महाराज सर्वरोगप्रणाशन ॥

आयुर्वेदं भरद्वाजात् प्राप्येह भिषजा क्रियाम् । तमष्टधा पुनर्व्यस्य शिष्येभ्यः प्रत्यपादयत् ॥

Dhanvantari is cited as an authority in the Carakasamhitā (S'ārīrasthāna 6 21), *Astāngahrdaya*³ and other works. For a fuller discussion of the problem of Dhanvantari the reader may refer to the learned Sanskrit Introduction to the Nirnayasaṅgraha edition of the Susrutasamhitā.

WRITERS AND TREATISES ON PAINTING, SCULPTURE, GEMS ETC.

A work on painting called Citrakarma ascribed to Prajāpati is quoted in Book IV प्रजापतिप्रोक्ते च चित्रकर्मणि—

अमण तैललिप्ताङ्गं नवभिर्भित्तिभिर्युतम् । यो लिखेत् स लिखेत् सर्वां पृथ्वीमपि ससागराम् ॥

A work on sculpture called Adityamata is quoted in the same Book. आदित्यमते च—

भववीजाङ्कुरमथना अष्टमहाप्रातिहार्यविभवसमेताः । ते देवा दशतालाः शेषा देवा भवन्ति नवतालाः ॥

A work on gems called Ratnapariṣā is quoted in Book V.

1 'काशिराज इव शरीरोपचारेषु'

2 'षु' शल्यशास्त्रे तस्य अन्तः पारम्भ्यति गच्छतीति धन्वन्तरि तम् ।

तदुक्त रत्नपरीक्षायाम्—

न केवल तच्छुभकृद्भूषणस्य मन्ये प्रजानामपि तद्विभूत्यै । यद्योजनानां परत शतादि सर्वाननर्थान् विमुखीकरोति ॥

The work cited by Somadeva is Buddhabhatta's Ratnaparikṣā, and the verse is found in the text edited by Finot in Les Lapidaires Indiens (Paris, 1896). The work is incorporated in Garudapurāṇa (Pūrvakhanda, chapters 68-80) without acknowledgement. The verse cited by Somadeva is also found among the verses quoted from Garudapurāṇa in Bhoja's Yuktikalpataru in the section on gems. It may be noted that Garudapurāṇa as well as the other two texts (with slight variations) read भाग्यै प्रजानामपि तस्य जन्म for मन्ये प्रजानामपि तद्विभूत्यै recorded by Somadeva. In Book II the young Yaśodhara is described as an expert in the examination of gems, like Sukanāsa, who seems to be an ancient authority on gems¹.

Reference to writers on elephants has been made in a preceding section. In Book II Yaśodhara is compared to Raivata in the mastery of the science of horses². That there were works on the subject in the tenth century is shown by the reference to the ācāryaparīṣad 'committee of experts' appointed to select a horse on the occasion of Yaśodhara's coronation in Book II and the use of technical terms. But Raivata is explained in the commentary as the son of the Sun, and appears to be a mythological figure. He is the same as the god Revanta mentioned in Brhatsamhitā 58-56, according to which his image should be represented as riding a horse, surrounded by a hunting party.

A quotation from Brhatsamhitā, Chap. 60, occurs in Book IV वराह-
मिहिरव्याहते प्रतिष्ठाकाण्डे च—

विष्णोर्भागवता मयाश्च सवितुर्विप्रा विदुर्ब्राह्मणां मातृगामिति मातृमण्डलविद् शम्भो समस्ता द्विजाः ।

शाक्या सर्वहिताय शान्तमनसो नम्रा जिनाना विदुर्यं यं देवमुपाश्रिता स्वभिधिना ते तस्य कुर्युं क्रियाम् ॥

A verse from Nimittādhyaṃya occurs in the same Book निमित्ताध्याये च—

पद्मिनी राजहसाश्च निर्ग्रन्थाश्च तपोधना । य देशमुपसर्पन्ति सुभिक्ष तत्र निर्दिशेत् ॥

A verse from Svapnādhyaṃya is quoted in Book VI, section I न चायं सत्यस्वप्नोऽप्रसिद्धः
स्वप्नाध्यायेऽतीव सुप्रसिद्धत्वात् । तथा हि—

यस्तु पश्यति राग्यन्ते राजान कुञ्जर हयम् । सुवर्णं वृषभं गां च कुटुम्ब तस्य वर्धते ॥

There is a Svapnādhyaṃya in thirty-five verses in Mat-yapurāṇa (Chap. 242), but it does not contain the above verse which, however, occurs in the Svapnādhyaṃya included in Agnipurāṇa (Chap. 229). Two interesting references to Svapnādhyaṃya on the science of dreams occur in Lalitavistara. In

1 'शुकनास इव रत्नपरीक्षासु'

2 'देवत इव हयनयेषु'

Chap 12 it is mentioned among the branches of study in which the Bodhisattva distinguished himself. In chap 6 we find mentioned a class of people whose vocation seems to have been the interpretation of dreams, being styled as स्वप्नाध्यायीपाठक.

A reference to the science of arms occurs in Book III, the Dhanurveda being described as occupying the highest place among treatises on the āyudhasiddhānta. It is, however, doubtful whether the verse 3. 465 is a citation from the Dhanurveda. Somadeva says

यावन्ति भुवि शस्त्राणि तेषां श्रेष्ठतरं धनुः । धनुषां गोचरे तानि न तेषां गोचरो धनुः ॥

इत्यायुधसिद्धान्तमध्यासादिनासिंहनादाद्धनुर्वेदादुपश्रुत्य .

A Pañcatantra is mentioned in Book VII, section 31, but it is doubtful whether it has anything to do with the wellknown book of tales 'पञ्चतन्त्रादि-शास्त्रविस्तृतवचन उग्रसेनो नाम सचिव ।' It is noteworthy that a marginal note in Ms. A explains pañcatantra as tarkavyākharanādi.

In the same section of Book VII the following verse is attributed to 'those who are well-versed in the Purāṇas' वदन्ति पुराणविद —

विधुर्गुरोः कलत्रेण गोतमस्यामरेश्वरः । संतनोश्चापि दुश्कर्मा समगंस्त पुरा किल ॥

Casual references to the Tripiṭaka and the treatise of Bharata occur in the description of the Jaina temple in Book V 'पिटकत्रयपद्धतिरेव योगाचारगोचरा', 'भरतपदवीव विधिलयनाट्याडम्बरा'.

Dattaka, an ancient authority on erotic lore, is mentioned in Book II¹. In Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra 1. 1. 11 Dattaka is said to have treated the section on courtesans of the Kāmasūtra of Bābhravya Pāñcāla in a separate treatise, being employed for the purpose by the courtesans of Pāṭaliputra. It may also be mentioned that a Kāmasūtra is mentioned at least twice by Somadeva, but without any reference to Vātsyāyana or any other author. 'न क्षमश्चिरपरिचितकामसूत्रायाः काकिलादिकरणोदाहरणानाम्' Book I, 'शृङ्गारवृत्तिभिरुदाहृतकामसूत्रम्' 1. 73.

A number of popular or moral verses is quoted by Somadeva without mentioning the source (Book VII, sections 27, 28, 29, Books IV & VII, Book VI, sections 5, 6, 10, 13, 15, 16, 17 and 19)

All the verses cited above occur in the two Books of Yasastilaka containing the moral and religious stories. Besides, at the end of each story is quoted a verse containing a summing up of the story in question, and these verses seem to belong to Jaina Kathānaka literature, and are probably quoted from earlier texts. One such verse (Book VII, section 24)

क्षुद्रमत्स्यः किलैकस्तु स्वयभूरमगोदधौ । महामत्स्यस्य कर्णस्थं स्मृतिदोषादधोगतः ॥

is, for example, found in Jātāsīmhanandī's Varāṅgacarita 5 103. Specimens of summary verses of this type are quoted below (from Books VI & VII)

APPENDIX I

SOMADEVA AND THE PRATHĪHĀRA COURT OF KANAUJ

A statement in the anonymous commentary on Somadeva's Nītvākyaṃrta appears to show that the work was written at the instance of a king of Kanauj named Mahendradeva or Mahendrapāladeva. The commentator, whose date is unknown, mentions, however, a Jaina monk named Muncandra as the author of Nītvākyaṃrta, and describes Somadeva as his guru.¹ This is, of course, contrary to all that we know about Somadeva who gives a lot of information about himself in the colophons to his Yasastilaka and Nītvākyaṃrta.

It has recently been suggested by some scholars² that Somadeva may have passed some time at Kanauj and, during his sojourn there, he was encouraged to compose his Nītvākyaṃrta by Mahendrapāla I (circa 893-907 A. D.), or more probably, by Mahendrapāla II who is known to have reigned about the middle of the tenth century A. D. The Partabgarh Inscription of the time of Mahendrapāla II of Kanauj is, for instance, dated Samvat 1003 = 946 A. D. (Ep. Ind. Vol. XIV, pp. 176-188). But the supposed connection of Somadeva with the Prathīhāra court of Kanauj can hardly be accepted as a historical fact; as, unlike his association with the Deccan, it is mentioned neither in the colophons to his works nor in the Parbhani inscription.

It has been suggested that the following acrostic verse found at the end of the first Book of Yasastilaka contains a veiled reference to Mahendrapāla.

सोऽयमाज्ञार्पितयशा महेन्द्रामरमान्यधी । देयात्ते सततानन्दं वस्त्वभीष्ट जिनाधिप ॥

The first letter of each foot of the verse gives, when combined, the name Somadeva, as pointed out in Śrīutasāgara's commentary, but it is extremely doubtful if there is any word-play in the expression mahendrāmara-mānya-dhīh leading to the surmise that Mahendrāmara stands for Mahendradeva or Mahendrapāla. Apart from the fact that the commentator is not aware of any such word-play, Mahendrāmara might very well refer to Mahendradeva, the elder brother of Somadeva, mentioned in the colophon to his Nītvākyaṃrta.

As pointed out elsewhere, Yaśodeva, the spiritual ancestor of Somadeva, belonged to the Devasamgha, according to the latter's own statement in Yasastilaka, but, according to the Parbhani inscription, Yaśodeva belonged to the Gaudasamgha. It is possible that the Gaṇḍasamgha was connected with the Gauda country, and Yaśodeva may have lived there. It is also possible that the Gaudasamgha, after its migration from Bengal, came to be known as

1 'तथा स्वगुरो सोमदेवस्य च प्रणामपूर्वकं शास्त्रस्य तत्कर्तृत्वं ख्यापयितुं. ..मुनिचन्द्रमिधानं क्षणकब्रतधर्तौ नीतिवाक्यामृतकर्त्ता'

2 See Raghavan in New Indian Antiquary, Vol. VI, p. 67 and Pt. Prem in Jaina Siddhānta Bhāṣakara, vol. XI, p. 90

Devasamgha, the name used by Somadeva. The latter was, however, the disciple not of Yaśodeva, but of Nemideva, and except for one solitary reference, he alone is mentioned in all the colophons occurring in Yaśastilaka and Nitvākyaṃrta. In the present state of our knowledge, there is no reason to suppose that Somadeva or his teacher Nemideva ever migrated from the Gauda country to Kanauj and thence to the Deccan.

The term Gauda in Gaudasamgha is not without some ambiguity. In south Kanara there is a class of people called Gaudas who are farmers and labourers and speak the Tulu or the Kannada language. They are generally Hindus, but some are Jains. They have a regular system of village government: in every village, for instance, there are two head-men, the Grāma-Gauda and the Vattu or Gottu Gauda.¹ It will not be surprising if the Gaudasamgha has something to do with the Gaudas. In the latter sense the word is derived from gāvunda (farmer) changing into gaunda or gauda, and it also means the village headman.

The Mysore inscriptions throw further light on the Gaudas. Some of the petty rulers of Mysore belonged to the Gauda caste or community. 'The Āvati-nād Prabhus were Gaudas or farmers of the Morasu-wokkal tribe, who came from the east in the fifteenth century and settled in the Āvati village', and 'their immediate descendants became founders of the modern States in eastern Mysore which were subordinate to Vijayanagar. The leader of the Āvati Prabhus was named Baire-Gauda, and the inscriptions of the family date from 1428 to 1792'. 'The Yelahanka-nād Prabhu is mentioned even in 1367, but the inscriptions of this Āvati branch run from 1599 to 1713. They generally had the name Kempe-Gauda, after the most celebrated of the line. He founded Bangalore in 1537'. The Sugatūr-nād Prabhu had the name Tamme Gauda, and their territory included a great part of the Kolar District. Other references to the Gaudas are also found in the Mysore inscriptions. 'In 1417, when a Gauda, who had gone to visit the local governor, fell down dead in his presence, a sort of inquest was held on the body and it was sent back to his home. This was under Vijayanagar rule'. Under Mughal rule 'we find in 1720 a regular magisterial process in the case of a Gauda whose village had been taken possession of by some one else during his absence abroad'.² It is also noteworthy that an inscription of 1027 A. D. refers to an agrahāra named Gauda with its 32,000 Brāhmana residents, believed to be an exaggeration.³

All this shows that the name Gauda was quite familiar in the Kanarese country both in the territorial and vocational sense as indicated above, and it is therefore difficult to rule out the possibility of the Gaudasamgha being originally connected with a village settlement of the Gaudas. We cannot, of course, be certain on the point, but the fact that Somadeva lived and worked in the Deccan inclines us to look for the home of his Samgha in 1 Sturrock South Canara quoted in Sharma Jainism and Karnātaka Culture, p. 158. See also Mahalingam Administration and Social Life under Vijayanagar, pp. 80, 236.

Karnāṭaka rather than in Bengal. It is true that we hear of Jaina Samghas in Bengal even at a later date, though the term Samgha has a slightly different sense here. The Jaina writer Bālacandīa Sūri, for example, tells us, in his Vasantavilāsa-mahākāvya (10 25), that Samghapatis from Lāta, Gauda, Vanga and other places came to join Vastupāla, the famous minister of Gujarat, in his grandiose pilgrimage to Śatruñjaya and Gūnar in 1220 A D.¹ But, so far as Somadeva is concerned, his supposed migration from Bengal does not appear to be supported by any reliable evidence so far discovered.

APPENDIX II

THE VERSES ON THE COURTEZAN'S CORPSE AND A BUDDHIST LEGEND

The Buddhist antecedents of Sudatta's reflections on the corpse of a courtesan lying in the charnel-field (Yasastilaka 1 95ff.) have been discussed in Chapter VI. That there was an underlying story going back to ancient times seems certain, and the framework of the original narrative can be seen in the story of Sirimā, as related in the Dhammapada commentary composed about the middle of the fifth century A D. The story occurs in Book XI in connection with Dhammapada 147, and is here summarized from Builingame Buddhist Legends, Part 2, p. 330 (Harvard Oriental Series, Vol 29). Certain verses of Somadeva on the dead courtesan recall the concluding words of the Teacher in the Buddhist legend.

Sirimā was a beautiful courtesan of Rājagaha, who used to give food to eight monks regularly in her house. A certain monk, hearing of her beauty, went to receive food in her house. She was ill at the time, but the monk was so enamoured of her that he became indifferent to all about him, and was unable to take any food.

"On that very day in the evening Sirimā died. Thereupon the king sent word to the Teacher, 'Reverend Sir, Jivaka's youngest sister Sirimā is dead.' When the Teacher received that message, he sent back the following message to the king, 'Sirimā's body should not be burned. Have her body laid in the burning-ground, and set a watch, that crows and dogs may not devour it.' The king did so. Three days passed, one after another. On the fourth day the body began to bloat, and from the nine openings of her body, which were like to sores, there oozed forth maggots."

The king then issued a proclamation ordering all to approach to behold Sirimā. He sent a message to the Teacher, asking that the Congregation of Monks presided over by the Buddha might approach to behold Sirimā.

"Now that young monk had lain for four days without touching food, paying no attention to anything anyone said to him, the rice in his bowl had rotted, and his bowl was covered with mildew. The rest of the monks who were his fellows approached him and said to him, 'Brother, the Teacher is going forth to behold Sīrīmā' When the young monk, lying thus, heard the name Sīrīmā, he leaped quickly to his feet. Someone said to him, 'The Teacher is going forth to behold Sīrīmā, will you also go?' 'Indeed I will go', he replied. And tossing the rice out of his bowl, he washed it and put it in his net and then set out with the company of monks.

The Teacher surrounded by the Congregation of Monks stood on one side of the corpse, the Congregation of Nuns and the king's retinue and the company of lay disciples, both male and female, stood on the other side of the corpse, each company in its proper place. The Teacher then asked the king, 'Great king, who is this woman?' 'Reverend Sir, it is Jivaka's sister Sirimā.' 'Is this Sirimā?' 'Yes, Reverend Sir.' 'Well! send a drum through the town and make proclamation, 'Those who will pay a thousand pieces of money for Sirimā may have her.''' Not a man said 'hem' or 'hum'. The king informed the Teacher, 'They will not take her, Reverend Sir.' 'Well then, great king, put the price down.' So the king had a drum beaten and the following proclamation made, 'If they will give five hundred pieces of money, they may have her.' But nobody would take her at that price. The king then proclaimed to the beating of a drum that anyone might have her who would give two hundred and fifty pieces of money, or two hundred, or hundred, or fifty, or twenty-five, or ten, or five. Finally he reduced the price to a penny, then to a half-penny, then to a quarter of a penny, then to an eighth of a penny. At last he proclaimed to the beating of a drum, 'They may have her for nothing.' Not a man said 'hem' or 'hum'. Then said the king to the Teacher, 'Reverend Sir, no one will take her, even as a gift.' The Teacher replied, 'Monks, you see the value of a woman in the eyes of the multitude. In this very city men used to pay a thousand pieces of money for the privilege of spending one night with this woman. Now there is no one who will take her as a gift. Such was her beauty who now has perished and gone. Behold, monks, this body diseased and corrupt.' So saying he pronounced the following stanza

147. *See this painted image, this mass of sores, huddled together,
Corrupt, once possessed of many thoughts, but now possessing neither strength nor stability "*

APPENDIX III

ŚAIVA TEMPLES AND THEIR GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION

GUJARAT

The power and influence of Śaivism is reflected in the numerous old temples dedicated to Śiva, which exist in various parts of India, and in many cases, go back far beyond the limits of the tenth century A. D. We may commence our survey with the celebrated temple of Somanātha on the seashore, in south-western Kathiawar, at Somanāthapattana, close to the modern port of Verāval. Somanātha was no doubt earlier than the tenth century, and may have been as early as the Maitrakas of Valabhi (the modern Vala, near Bhavnagar), who held sway over Gujarat and Kathiawar during the sixth, seventh and eighth centuries of the Christian era, and call themselves parama-māheśvara or devout worshippers of Śiva in their inscriptions.¹ The great Śaiva temple was built upon fifty-six pillars of teak wood covered with lead, and the glory of its wealth and splendour lives in the pages of Muslim historians.² It was sacked and desecrated by Mahmud of Ghazni in 1026 A. D., and subsequently destroyed by a lieutenant of Mahmud, but soon after, it was rebuilt of stone by Bhimadeva I, the Solanki king of Gujarat (1022-64 A. D.) It was again restored and rebuilt by Kumārapāla in the third quarter of the twelfth century, evidently in consequence of its being again attacked, or of having fallen into ruin. The present ruin represents the rebuilding by Kumārapāla.³

Śaivism was paramount in Gujarat during the rule of the Solanki kings who were great builders of temples dedicated to Śiva. Their capital was at Anahillapura (Anahilavāda or Patan), and other important places during their reign were Siddhapur and Vadnagar, now included in Baroda State, to the north of Ahmedabad. The first king Mūlarāja (942-96 A. D.) was a fervent devotee of Śiva in the form of Somanātha or Someśvara; and the temple of Mūlesvara and the Tripurusaprāsāda appear to have been built by him in honour of Somanātha.⁴ Siddharāja (1094-1143), whose name is still familiar everywhere in Gujarat, built the great Sahasralinga tank which derived its name from the numerous linga shrines on its banks. In the centre of the tank was an island on which stood the temple of Rudreśvara.⁵

1 Exceptions are Dhruvasena I (526 A. D.) who is called parama-bhāgavata, and his brother and successor Dharapatta who is styled paramāditya-bhakta or a great devotee of the Sun. Guhasena, who was a worshipper of Śiva (558-564), calls himself paramopāsaka or a great devotee of Buddha in his grant of 566 A. D. Bombay Gazetteer, Vol I, pt I, p 83, Poussin Dynasties et Histoire de L'Inde, pp 133-139.

2 See Bombay Gazetteer, Vol I, pt I, p 165. The ancient temple is stated to have been thirteen storeys high, with its top surmounted by fourteen cupolas of gold which glittered in the sun and were visible from a long distance. The original edifice was built of brick and its floor was made of planks of teak wood with the interstices filled with lead. See Commissariat History of Gujarat, Vol I, lx and Nazim The Life and Times of Sultan Mahmud of Ghazna, p 212.

3 Cousens Architectural Antiquities of Western India, p 40. Kumārapāla's temple suffered in every subsequent Muhammadan invasion of the place, though it was repaired and restored from time to time. In 1395 it was destroyed by Muzaffar Khan, and again by Ahmad I, after his war with the Rāj of Junagadh in 1414. Commissariat (op cit), p lxxiv.

5 'Hardly a vestige now remains of the Sahasralinga tank, the theme of so much legend and song. Its site is still pointed out to the north-west of modern Patan.' Commissariat (op cit), p lxxi.

Siddharāja restored and rebuilt also the great temple of Rudramahālaya, which had been founded by Mūlarāja at Siddhapur on the north bank of the Sarasvatī, seventeen miles to the east of Patan. In or around the court were eleven other shrines in honour of the Rudias. This magnificent temple was destroyed by the Muslim conquerors of Gujarat, but the stupendous fragments that still exist give an adequate idea of the grandiose design of the original structure.¹

Vadnagar (the ancient Ānandapura), situated 19 miles southeast from Siddhapur, was a great religious centre in Gujarat, and noted as the home of the Nāgara Brāhmanas who worshipped Śiva. An inscription engraved on a stone slab records the building of the walls of the town by Kumārāpāla, the equally famous successor of Siddharāja, in Samvat 1208 or 1151 A. D. The town had at one time an unusually large number of temples, but the number 3000 mentioned by Abul Fazl at the end of the sixteenth century is no doubt an exaggeration. The chief temple, that of Hātakeśvara Mahādeva, is a lofty structure to the west of the town.²

It is sad to think that few temples in Gujarat have survived intact, and the only remains now of the Solankis and the Vaghelas are but fragments. Fortunately, the great temples of the Deccan, Bundelkhand, Orissa and South India are still in existence, and we shall in the course of our study enumerate the more important examples as far as they illustrate the progress and influence of the Śaiva faith in those regions.

From Gujarat we may turn to Mount Abu which was a flourishing centre of Saivism at an early age. The Prabhāsakhaṇḍa of the Skandapurāṇa has a section on Arbuda or mount Abu, which gives an account of its sacred sites and the legends associated with them. In mediæval times the Abu region was ruled by a branch of the Paramāra dynasty of Mālava from the end of the tenth century to the end of the thirteenth under the suzerainty of the Caulukyias of Gujarat. It may be noted that Bhīma I of Gujarat (1022-64 A. D.) brought for a time the Abu territory under his direct control in the second quarter of the eleventh century, and the Jaina Vimala Sāha was deputed as the governor of Abu, who built the famous marble temple of Ādinātha in 1031 A. D.

Among the lingas worshipped at Abu, Acaleśvara was the most famous. An inscription of Yaśodhavāla, one of the Paramāra kings of Abu, dated 1150 A. D., was found in the temple of Acaleśvara. Early in the thirteenth century we hear of the prince Pahlādāna, the founder of Palanpur, melting down a Jaina brass image for making a metal bull for Acaleśvara Mahādeva.³

2 Ibid lxxii. It may be noted that, while the main temples in Gujarat were dedicated to Śiva, there were ancient temples devoted to the cult of Kṛṣṇa or Viṣṇu at Dvārakā and the adjoining island of Bet or Śankhoddhāra. They were destroyed by Mahmud Shah I in his expedition of 1473. The existing temples are later structures. Ibid p. 174.

3 Ganguly History of the Paramāra Dynasty, pp. 304, 319.

The sacred sites of Mount Abu mentioned in the Arbudakhanda of the Skandapurāṇa include Kanakhala (chap 26) and Candikāśrama (chap 36), or the hermitage of Candikā, which appears to have been a shrine of the goddess with an attached monastery. Both Kanakhala and Candikāśrama are mentioned in the Abu inscription of the Śaiva ascetic Kedārarāśi, which gives a detailed account of his building activities at Kanakhala. The inscription was incised in 1208 A D during the reign of Dhārāvarsa at Abu under the suzerainty of Bhīma II of Gujarat. The record opens with verses in praise of Śiva and Ujjain, and enumerates the succession of teachers of the Capala or Capaliya sect which seems to have been an order of Śaiva monks in Mālava. Altogether eight teachers are mentioned, and the first teacher Tāpasa, a great devotee of Candikā or Śiva, came from the New Monastery (Nūtanamatha) at Ujjain, and became the head of the Candikāśrama which was, as we have seen, located at Mount Abu. Kedārarāśi, the last teacher to be mentioned must have lived in the last quarter of the twelfth century, and to judge from the succession of teachers and disciples, Tāpasa may have become the head of the Candikāśrama about the middle of the eleventh century. As regards Kedārarāśi, he carried out an extensive building programme, according to his inscription. He renovated the entire site of Kanakhala with stone-slabs (uttānapatta), and provided it with an enclosure with lofty walls. He repaired also the temple of Atulanātha, built two new massive temples of Śiva in front of the shrine of Kanakhalanātha, and erected a row of pillars of black stone, in the mandapa of the temple of Kanakhalaśambhu. His sister Mokseśvari also built a beautiful temple of Śiva at the place.¹

The capital of the Paramāra Chiefs of Abu until about the beginning of the 14th century was at Candrāvati, now a small village at the junction of the Śivālan with the Banās river near the south end of Mount Abu and in the Sirohi State. Here the numerous temples were constructed of white marble, a rare phenomenon in the history of Hindu architecture, and many of them must have been dedicated to Śiva, as Śaivism was the prevailing religion in this area. The evidence of sculptures, scanty though it is, points to the same conclusion. In one of the marble edifices, for instance, the principal figures were a three-headed statue with a female seated on his knee, sitting on a car, with a large goose in front (i.e. Brahmā), Śiva with twenty arms, Bhairava with twenty arms, one holding a human head by the hair, a victim lying beneath, and a female on each side, one drinking the blood falling from the head. Unfortunately Candrāvati is in ruins, and no idea can be formed of the cults practised in its beautiful temples.²

1 An Abu inscription of the reign of Bhīmadeva II, Indian Antiquary, Vol XI, p 220

2 Candrāvati is one of the tragedies of Indian archaeology. Twenty marble edifices of different sizes were still in existence when the spot was first visited by Sir Charles Colville and his party in 1824. Nevertheless, about this time, the petty Chief of Girwar, a few miles to the northwest of Candrāvati, who regularly sold the marble materials, was called by Colonel Tod 'the depredator and salesman

Śaivism was the prevailing religion in neighbouring Mewar where the worship of Ekalinga Śiva was the symbol of a national cult and has survived till today. The worship of Ekalinga is mentioned in an inscription of Nalavāhana, dated 972 A D, but the cult is earlier than the tenth century as two inscriptions, dated Samvat 1331 and 1342 (1274 and 1285 A D) respectively, which give the genealogy of the ruling dynasty, place the cult of Ekalinga at the beginning of the political history of Mewar.¹ We are told that an ascetic named Hārītarāśī who was a devotee of Ekalinga gave a miraculous gold anklet to Bappa, the Brāhmana founder of the dynasty, and helped him to acquire the throne. The cult of Ekalinga was thus prevalent at least as early as the ninth century, and the deity is still worshipped at the place now called Ekalingaji, about twelve miles north of Udaipur on the way to Nāthadvāra. The present temple is not later than 1213 A D, as a date, Samvat 1270, is inscribed on a pillar together with the name of Rājā Jaitrasimha.²

The evidence to be considered further will show that Śaivism represented a vigorous religious movement in a large part of western and central India from Gujarat to Rewa in the tenth century and thereabouts. The expansion of Śaivism in western India goes back, however, to a much earlier date, as it was the prevailing religion under the Valabhi kings as early as the sixth century A D.

MĀLAVA

An early and celebrated focus of Śaivism was in Mālava whose capital Ujjayinī or Avantī was famous through the ages as the seat of the worship of of what time and the ruthless Turk had spared of its relics'. Gustav le Bon, a French archaeologist, writing in 1884, said that he had made a long journey to Candrāvati to visit a temple among other remains, but was informed that the temple had been recently reduced to fragments by an engineer to pave a road'. Cousens who visited the place at a later date reported "Save portions of the basement of one temple and a few blocks of the back wall of another, nothing now remains of the beautiful shrines discovered in 1822 excepting one solitary column, which by its loneliness accentuates the desolation around it". The fact is that the temples of Candrāvati were literally carried off to build railway bridges and culverts and to break up for metalling the permanent way. 'The site of the old city and its extent are still indicated by the mounds of bricks that formed the foundations of these old temples—of which there are great numbers; and on the south side are portions of the ancient city walls which faced the river Sivalan'. 'Judging from such images as still lie about, it would appear that the majority of the temples were Brahmanical, and that they were built of white marble'. See Burgess and Cousens Archaeological Survey of Western India (Northern Gujarat), Vol IX, pp 96-102.

Mahākāla Śiva The legends connected with the numerous sacred sites and lingas of Avantiksetra, known also as Mahākāla-vana, are narrated in detail in the Avantyakhaṇḍa of the Skandapurāṇa. Mahākālavana is described here as a yojana in extent, and mentioned as one of the most important Śaiva Tirthas along with Prabhāsa, Puskara, Kedāra and Kāyāvarohana. It is possible that the famous temple of Mahākāla existed as early as the fifth century A. D. Kālidāsa, in his Meghadūta (vv 30-7), in the course of the description of Ujjayinī, refers to the sacred abode (dhāma) of Candīśvara, styled also as Mahākāla, on the Gandhavatī river, which is in fact one of the sacred streams of Avantiksetra mentioned in the Skandapurāṇa.¹

The temple of Mahākāla at Ujjain was as famous as that of Somanātha in Kathiawar. About the middle of the tenth century, Dhanika, a Paramāra chief of Vāgada (the modern Banswara and Dungarpur States in Southern Rajputana, not far from Ujjain), is known to have erected the Śiva temple of Dhaneśvara near Mahākāla.² Early in the tenth century, the Rāstrakūta emperor Indra III, while leading an expedition to conquer Kanauj, is believed to have stopped with his war elephants at the courtyard of the temple of Mahākāla to pay homage to the deity.³ The great temple continued to exist for more than two hundred years after the destruction of the temple of Somanātha, but the tragedy was re-enacted in 1233 A. D. when Sultan Īltutmish invaded Ujjain and demolished the ancient shrine during the reign of the Paramāra king Devapāla. According to Firishta, the magnificent temple was built on the same plan as that of Somanātha, and is said to have occupied three hundred years in building. It contained the image of Vikramāditya as well as that of Mahākāla, which the invader caused to be conveyed to Delhi and broken at the door of the great mosque.⁴

The Paramāras of Mālava, who ruled as independent monarchs from about the middle of the tenth century to the end of the thirteenth, and whose dominions, in their widest limits, extended from Gujarat to Central Provinces and from Khandesh to Northern Indore, were devout worshippers of Śiva and great builders of Śiva temples. The Paramāra king Bhoja, the most famous Indian monarch of the eleventh century A. D., built a number of temples dedicated to Kedāreśvara, Rāmeśvara, Somanātha, Sumdīra (?) and Kālānala-Rudra.⁵ These temples no longer exist, as most of the religious edifices of Mālava were destroyed by the Muhammadans.

5 See Verse 20 of the Udepur Prasasti of the kings of Mālva in Epigraphia Indica, Vol. I, pp 222-38. Bühler takes Kāla, Anala and Rudra separately. But the reference seems to be to Kālāgni-Rudra, one of the terrible forms of Śiva, mentioned by Soma-deva in Yasastilaka, Book I, p. 151.

Of the existing temples of Mālava the Nilakanthesvara at Udayapur and the Siddhanātha or Siddhesvara at Nemawar, both dedicated to Śiva, are the most important. The temple of Nilakanthesvara at Udayapur, now a village thirty miles to the north of Bhilsa, in Gwalior State, was built by the Paramāra king Udayāditya in 1059 A D.¹ Built of red sandstone, it is one of the best preserved temples in India, as it somehow escaped to a very large extent the devastating hand of Muslim vandalism, although there is still a Muhammadan masjid at the back of the temple. A legend says that Aurangzeb, on his return from the Deccan, passed through this place and ordered the demolition of the temple, but Mahādeva appeared to him in a dream, and commanded him on pain of death to desist from his act of sacrilege. The next morning Aurangzeb found himself ill, and stopped the destruction of the temple, but a masjid was ordered to be built at the back of the temple. It is noteworthy that until recent times the temple was 'frequented by both Hindus and Muhammadans and the lingam within equally revered by both'. The linga is 'now inclosed in a shell of highly polished yellow metal said to be gold'.

The temple 'is singularly beautiful both in plan and in elevation, and although large, the parts are so well-proportioned, that it does not look large, and it is only on measurement that its real size is realized'. 'But it is in excellence of execution of the floral sculptured ornamentation that this temple surpasses all others. They are executed with remarkable fineness and freedom and are not overcrowded so as to destroy effect, but by a judicious interposition of broad plain surfaces worked with exquisite care, the ornamental value both of the flowered bands and of the plain are mutually enhanced. Doubtless a great deal of the beauty of the carvings is due to the superior quality of the stone here used, and the Khajurāho temples, if built of similar materials, would, some of them, have been more beautiful'. 'The great dome is formed of overlapping courses of stones, ranged in successive diminishing circles over each other. Twelve ribs, each rib composed of exquisitely sculptured females, at once adorn and strengthen this beautiful roof, and this roof, thus adorned, and as it were vivified by the sculptures, rests on the massive pillars below, forming a whole of unsurpassed beauty and harmony'.²

The richly sculptured temple of Siddhanātha stands right on the bank of the Narmadā at Nemawar in Indore State, twelve miles from Harda station on the G. I. P. Railway. It cannot be later than the 10th century, and consists of a garbhagrha and a mandapa, which is open on three sides with an open porch on each side. The mandapa appears to be a later addition, and is built of bluish sandstone, while the garbhagrha with its sikhara is built of beautiful yellowish grey sandstone. Except for a modern structure which has been added on the top of the mandapa providing access to the chamber immediately above the garbhagrha, the edifice 'has not suffered any damage or structural alteration during the nine hundred years that have elapsed since it was built' The temple is in use, and worship is still carried on there on an elaborate scale To the north of the temple of Siddhanātha is an unfinished temple of Viṣṇu, of which only the garbhagrha stands ¹

1 Ganguly: History of the Paramāra Dynasty, p. 258. The temple of Mandalesvara Mahādeva at Pānāherā in Banswara State in Southern Rajputana was also built in 1059 A D. by Mandalika, a Paramāra chief of the Vāgada branch of the family. See Two Paramāra Inscriptions (op cit.)

The large temple of Bhojeśvara is situated at Bhojpur twenty miles to the south of the city of Bhopal It appears to be named after the great Paramāra king Bhoja, and has been assigned to the eleventh or twelfth century A D In plan the building is a simple square, and an incomplete but richly carved dome is supported by four massive pillars, each of which is 40 feet in height Inside the building stands a colossal linga, seven and a half feet high and more than seventeen feet in circumference, on a platform made of three superimposed blocks of sand-stone ²

An important group of Śaiva temples, fairly well-preserved, exists in the large township of Un in the Nimar District of Indore State ³ It has been said that 'with the exception of Khajurāho in central India, there is no other place in Northern India where so many ancient temples are still to be found intact The carvings on the temples at Un are slightly less elaborate than those on the celebrated temples of Khajurāho, but in all other respects they would compare very favourably with the Khajurāho group.' There are at least seven temples of Śiva of which the largest is called Chaubara Dera It has an elaborately carved magnificent mandapa with a large porch in the front and two small ones on the sides The mandapa is supported by four round carved pillars, and the dome over it is richly carved in the style of the domes of the marble temple of Vastupāla-Tejapāla on Mount Abu The group of buildings includes a large temple of Śiva called Mahākāleśvara⁴ and another of the same name. The Śiva temple of Vallaleśvara appears to have been rebuilt at a later date when a round dome like that of a mosque was built in place of the sikhara A beautifully carved temple of Śiva called Nilakanthesvara stands inside the modern village, and close to it is a small underground temple of Śiva called Gupteśvara 'The shrine, of which only a small underground chamber remains, must have been originally below the ground level, as the level of the floor of the garbhagrha is about thirty feet below the level of the floor of the sanctum in the temple of Nilakanthesvara.'

4 A temple dedicated to Śiva under the name of Mākāleśvara (Mahākāleśvara) also exists in the village of Makla in the Mehidpur District of Indore State This district lies in the centre of Mālava and is very close to Ujjain The mandapa of the temple has been rebuilt, but the garbhagrha is intact, and provides a good example of Hindu temple architecture of the 11th and 12th centuries in Mālva. Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, 1920, p. 101.

A typically Śaiva sculpture representing Śiva and the Seven Mothers is found engraved on doors and lintels in some of the temples including the Chaubara Dera. An inscription in the latter temple mentions Udayāditya of Mālava who is known to have reigned in the latter part of the eleventh century. This is no doubt an important clue to the age of the temples at Un. Another inscription in the Chaubara Dera temple engraved on the figure of a serpent exhibits the Sanskrit alphabet and some of the conjugational terminations, and this had apparently an educational purpose. Two similar inscriptions, on a larger scale, are engraved on two pillars in the Bhojaśālā or School of King Bhoja, now the Masjid of Kamal Maula, at Dhar.¹

The island of Māndhātā in the Narmadā, in the Nīmar District of Central Provinces, south-east of Indore, was a seat of Śaiva worship at an early age, probably long before the tenth century. To judge from

- 1 Ibid p 46. Remains of old Śiva temples are fairly numerous in Indore State, many of which have been rebuilt in later times. Two or three of these temples may be mentioned. The village of Modī, seven miles to the west of Bhanpura in the north of Indore State, contains the ruins of a number of temples, one of which is still in position. The temple was dedicated to Śiva, but only the garbhagrha is intact. 'The lintel of the door leading to the interior of the sanctum bears the figure of Śiva as Lakulīśa, and some of the large stones of the basement bear inscriptions in characters of the 12th century A D'. The village of Kukdesvar, ten miles to the west of Rampura in the north of Indore State, contains the temple of Sahasra mukhesvara. The old temple having collapsed, the present structure was built in its place. But the linga in the sanctum is very old and a real sahasralinga. 'It consists of a huge linga about three feet in height and twelve to sixteen inches in diameter. The body of the linga is covered with rows of miniature lingas of uniform shape and size measuring about an inch and a half in height'.

'The tableland or plateau at the foot of which Bhanpura lies is thickly studded with ancient remains, and shows ample signs of having been at one time a thickly populated locality of ancient Mālava'. The remains on this plateau include those of two old temples at Navalī or Naoli. One of these is the temple of Nandikesvara which stands at the southern end of the village. The temple was partly rebuilt at a later date with the old materials. The mandapa has disappeared, but the sanctum still stands. The linga of Nandikesvara is octagonal at the bottom and round at the top.

Old Vaiṣṇava temples are found here and there in Indore State. The old village of Kohala, for instance, in the Garoth District in northern Indore, six miles from Bhanpura, contains three temples dedicated to Viṣṇu. The largest is the temple of Vārāha which contains one of the finest images of the Boar Incarnation. Of the other two temples that of Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa is one of the best preserved monuments in Mālava. 'The śikhara is tall and slender, and resembles that of the temple of Mahākālesvara at Un'. The temple of Caturbhujā is exactly similar in plan, but the śikhara is far inferior to that of Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa. The temple of Śeṣaśāyīn exists at the village of Kethulī which lies at the foot of the plateau on which Navalī (see above) is situated. An old temple of Viṣṇu, partly rebuilt, exists at Kukdesvar. 'With the exception of the roof, the porch in front and the Mandapa are of the same date as the old garbhagrha on the west, i. e. 12th or 13th century A D'. The existing Vaiṣṇava temples in Mālava are of uncertain date, and there is apparently no Vaiṣṇava temple which can compare in grandeur and magnitude with any of the outstanding major temples dedicated to Śiva. See Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, for 1920.

the evidence of the Revākhanda included in the Skandapurāṇa, the banks of the river were studded with holy places beginning from the sacred Amarkantak on the Maikal Range in Central India. All the temples on the island are devoted to the worship of Śiva or his associate deities; but Muslim vandalism has done its work so thoroughly (from about 1400 A. D.) that 'every dome has been overthrown, every figure mutilated.' There are numerous temples ancient and modern, but the age of the older shrines does not appear to have been accurately determined.

The celebrated shrine of Omkāra, a form of Śiva, is situated on the island, and that of Amareśvara on the southern bank of the river. These are among the most famous of the ancient Lingas in India, and pilgrims who have vowed to visit the twelve Jyotirlingas offer their adorations to both Omkāra and Amareśvara. References to Omkāra and Amareśvara are occasionally found in the inscriptions of the Paramāra kings of Mālava. The Māndhātā plates of Jayasimha issued in 1055 A. D. record the grant of a village for the maintenance of the Brāhmanas of the paṭṭasālā at the holy site of Amareśvara. An inscription of Arjunavarman issued in 1215 A. D. during his sojourn at Amareśvara says that he granted certain lands to a Brāhmana after having worshipped Omkāra, the lord of Bhavānī. Three plates recording a grant of Devapāla in 1225 A. D. were found near the temple of Siddheśvara at Māndhātā. Evidently the Nīmar District was included in the dominions of the Paramāras of Mālava in the early part of the thirteenth century A. D. Earlier than this, the famous Paramāra king Vākpati Muṇja, who reigned towards the end of the tenth century A. D., is said to have built many temples and embankments at places like Ujjain, Maheśvara and Māndhātā.¹

'The oldest of the Śivaite temples is probably that on the Birkhala rocks. Unlike the other temples, which present the ordinary shrine and porch, it consists of a courtyard, with a verandah and colonnades supported on massive pillars, boldly carved in rectilineal figures.' 'On the hill stand the ruins of a very fine temple, now called Siddheśvara Mahādeva. To each of the four sides of the shrine was added a projection containing a doorway, and before every doorway was a porch resting on fourteen pillars, elaborately carved and about 4 feet high.' 'The temple of Gaurī Somanātha appears to be an old shrine rebuilt with lime. Somanātha himself is a gigantic linga, now black, but once white, as his name denotes.' It may be noted that traces of Vaiṣṇavism are not wholly absent in the Māndhātā region. The north bank of the river opposite contains some old structures devoted to Viṣṇu. 'Where the Narmadā bifurcates are the remains of some gateways and a large shapeless building containing twenty-four figures of Viṣṇu and his avatāras, carved in good style in a close-grained green stone. Among them is a large Varāha or Boar Avatāra covered with the same panoply of sitting figures as that at Khandwā.'²

BUNDELKHAND AND BAGHELKHAND

From Mālava we may pass on to Bundelkhand which was an important centre of Śaivism during the rule of the Chandel kings in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries. The Chandel Kingdom included Khajurāho (now a village in Chhatarpur State, Central India), Kālāñjar in Bāndā Dt, U.P. and Mahoba (in Hamirpur Dt, U.P.) Khajurāho is famous for its group of magnificent temples second in importance only to the Bhuvaneśvar group in Northern India. The splendour of Khajurāho reached its climax in the tenth century during the reign of Dhanga (c 950-1000 A.D.), who was a devout Śaiva, and died, according to an inscription, at Prayāga, 'fixing his thoughts on Rudra, and muttering holy prayers'. The northern style of temple architecture found its most perfect expression in the edifices at Khajurāho, which were designed on a grand scale, executed in a fine sandstone, and richly adorned with sculpture. Dhanga's father Yaśovarman (c 930-50 A.D.) built the magnificent Caturbhuj temple completed in 954 A.D.¹, but the largest building of the Khajurāho group is the great Śiva temple called Kandariyā Mahādeo, believed to have been erected during the tenth century. It is 109 feet in length and 59½ feet in width with a height of 116½ feet above the ground.² The temple known as Viśvanātha is no less grand, the steeple being about 100 feet high, and was, according to an inscription, built during Dhanga's reign.³ 'The temple of Mrtanga

- 1 A temple of Nārāyaṇa was built by queen Citralekhā in 955 A.D. at Bayana in Bharatpur State. The relevant inscription recording the fact is incised on a slab in the pavement of the Ukā mosque at Bayana, now transformed into the Ukā mandir. A portion of an old Hindu temple found inside the Ukā mandir might represent the remains of the temple of Nārāyaṇa erected by queen Citralekhā. Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, 1919, p. 43, 1920, p. 109.
- 2 The temple contains a marble linga 4½ feet in girth. Cunningham counted no less than 226 statues inside the temple, and 646 outside, or 872 statues altogether, of which the greater number are from 2½ to nearly 3 feet in height. 'The richness of the carvings is rivalled by the profusion of the sculptures'. 'The general effect of this gorgeous luxury of embellishment is extremely pleasing, although the eye is often distracted by the multiplicity of the details'.
- 3 The Viśvanātha temple is 87½ feet long by 46 feet broad. Its plan is similar to that of the Kandariyā temple, 'but it is altogether in better preservation itself, and its five subordinate temples are still standing or traceable at the four corners of its terrace, and in front of the entrance'. Cunningham counted 602 statues of from 2 to 2½ feet in height 'in the different ranges of sculpture of this gorgeous temple'. Inside the shrine there is a linga. 'Inside the entrance portico of this temple, there are two large inscribed slabs which are dated respectively, in the Samvat years 1056 and 1058 or A.D. 999 and 1001.' The earlier inscription records the building of the temple to Śiva and the dedication of a linga made of emerald (marakata-mayam) by Rājā Dhanga. The temple itself is said to have been called Pramathanātha, but the emerald linga no longer exists. Facing the entrance of the Viśvanātha temple is a small open temple which contains a colossal recumbent figure of the bull Nandi. 'In plan it is a square of 16 feet with 12 pillars and a small open porch of two pillars on each of the four sides, thus forming an open temple of 20 pillars'. 'It evidently forms part of the Viśvanātha temple, and must be of the same date'.

Mahādeo¹ is remarkable for its large dome of overlapping stones, with a diameter of 22 feet, without extraneous support' The temples are in more or less satisfactory preservation, which is largely due to the fact that Khajurāho luckily escaped the fury of Muslim vandalism

There are two more temples on the Kurar Nala to the south of the village, called Nilkanth Mahādeo and Kunwār Math. The former is a mass of ruins, but inside the sanctum there still exists the argha or pedestal of a linga. A pilgrim's inscription carved on the wall of the sanctum bears the date Samvat 1174 (A D 1117), and refers to the deity as Gauia or the White God. The temple seems to have been erected in the tenth or eleventh century. The Kunwār Math is also dedicated to Śiva, whose figure occupies the central position over the doorway of the sanctum, between Brahmā and Viṣṇu. It is one of the finest temples at Khajurāho, and 66 feet long and 33 feet broad outside. There is no inscription to fix the date of the temple, but as the word Vasala, a mason's mark, is repeated several times on the stones of both of the Kurar Nala temples, Cunningham infers that they are of the same age, that is, the tenth or eleventh century. At Jatkari, 1½ miles to the south of Khajurāho, there are two dilapidated temples, one of which is dedicated to Śiva whose linga of marble is enshrined within.

Kālāñjar, with its strong fortress, was the military stronghold of the Chandel kings, and from early times the hill was famous as a favourite resort of Śaiva ascetics. The buildings at Kālāñjar are not, however, important as architecture. 'The upper gate, leading to the outwork in the middle of the west face, where the great lingam of Nilakantha stands, is attributed by local tradition to king Parmāl or Paramardi (1165-1203 A D)'. A hymn of praise to Śiva composed by Paramardi is inscribed on a slab at Kālāñjar bearing the date 1201 A D.

At Mahoba there is the Madan Sāgar lake associated with the Chandel king Madanavarman (1128-1165 A D). A fairly well-preserved granite temple, equal in size to the largest of the sandstone temples at Khajurāho, stands on a rocky island in the north west corner of the lake. The shrine is known as Kakrā Marh and was dedicated to Śiva. The ruins of a second temple dedicated to Viṣṇu, called Madārī, exist on another islet in the lake. Both the temples are ascribed to the reign of Madanavarman.

The Devī cult is almost everywhere associated with Śaivism, and it is noteworthy that a tribal goddess called Maniyā Deo (Devī) was the tutelary deity of the Chandels. Maniyā Devī appears to be akin to the Gond deities, and reminds one of Vindhyaśinī, who was worshipped by the hill tribes of the Vindhya region, as described by Vākpati in his Gauḍavaho. There are 1 Called also Mrtyuñjaya Mahādeva. It is a large square temple enshrining a colossal linga, 8 feet in height and 3 feet 8 inches in diameter. 'It is 24½ feet square inside and 35 feet square outside, with a projecting porch 18½ feet long and 9½ feet broad on each side'. 'It is situated 30 feet to the south of the Caturbhuj temple, and is most probably of the same age' (i. e. the middle of the tenth century A D).

three known shrines of the goddess, at Mahoba, at Maniyāgarh, a large ruined fort, situated on a hill overlooking the town of Rājgarh in Chhatarpur State, and at the village of Barel in Hamirpur District. The Devī Jagadāmbī temple at Khajurāho is among the best, and like the others, has been assigned to the tenth century.

There is no doubt that Śaivism was the prevailing religion in Bundelkhand, and the architectural grandeur of Khajurāho rests on the great temples dedicated to Śiva but the cult of Viṣṇu had also a recognised place, as shown by some of the temples dedicated to that deity¹. The Baghārī inscription found near Mahoba commemorates the building of temples to both Viṣṇu and Śiva by the ministers of Parmāl or Paramardī in 1195 A. D. We may refer in this connection to the allegorical play Prabodhacandrodaya, which was produced during the reign of the Chandel king Kīrtivarman, about the year 1065 A. D. it refers to shrines of Viṣṇu (v 5) and glorifies Viṣṇubhakti (Faith in Viṣṇu), one of the prominent characters in the play. It may, however, be noted that Śiva is glorified in the second verse of the prologue, and we are told in v 9 that the Absolute is variously designated as Brahmā, Viṣṇu or Śiva².

Śaivism was prevalent not only in Bundelkhand but in other areas of Central India. Jaso, the chief town of the tiny state of that name in Baghelkhand, seems to have been an important place in the middle ages. It contains an old temple of Śiva and a large tank called the Rekra Talav. Two colossal images of Śiva as Tripurāri and Natesa were found close to the Rekra Talav. The temple of Kumhra Mahādeva is a building in the Khajurāho style of about the eleventh or twelfth century³.

- 1 The most important is the Caturbhuj completed in 954 A. D. (see above). 'The temple is 85 feet 4 inches in length and 44 feet in breadth, or almost exactly the same size as Viṣṇvanātha.' Immediately to the east of the Caturbhuj temple is a small open temple containing a colossal statue of the Varāha Avatāra of Viṣṇu. No. 17 in Cunningham's list is a large temple situated close to the north end of the village. 'The temple is called Vāmana or the Dwarf Incarnation of Viṣṇu, a name which is certainly not correct, for, although there is a large statue of the dwarf god, 4 feet 8 inches high, enshrined inside, yet there is a small figure of Śiva himself over the centre of the entrance to the sanctum, with Brahmā and Viṣṇu to the right and left.' One or two more temples of Viṣṇu are mentioned by Cunningham.
- 2 For the Chandel kings and their monuments see Vincent Smith History and Coinage of the Chandel dynasty in Indian Antiquary, 1908. 'The remains, more or less complete, of more than thirty temples are traceable at Khajurāho and the neighbouring village of Jatkari.' See also Cunningham Archaeological Survey of India, Vol. II, pp. 412-39. Cunningham writing in 1865 says that Khajurāho is still frequented by pilgrims who assemble in thousands for the celebration of the Śivarātri in the month of Phālgun, at which time an annual fair is held. It may be noted that a similar fair is held at Elephanta on the occasion of the Śivarātri festival every year in February when pilgrims visit the island in large numbers to worship the linga enshrined in the great cave temple in the western hill. Sastri A Guide to Elephanta, p. 32.
- 3 Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, for the year ending 31 st March, 1919, p. 60.

It may be noted that the history of Śaivism in this region goes back to much earlier times. Seven miles to the south-east of Jaso are the ruins of the ancient city of Nachna Kuthara in Ajaygadh State in Bundelkhand. Some of the oldest known Hindu temples in India have been discovered at this place. The earliest of these is a flat-roofed temple surrounded by a narrow covered veranda on three sides. 'There was a very small mandapa or porch in front of the only door of the shrine, which has collapsed entirely'. Over the shrine is a small upper chamber instead of a sikhara, with a flat roof slightly raised at the centre. The temple is well-preserved, but without any idol, and has been assigned to the early Gupta period, i.e., 4th - 5th century A.D. To the south-west of this temple there is a large stone-built temple of Śiva with a tall spire, which has been assigned to the later Gupta age. The mandapa in front has collapsed, and 'inside the temple there is a huge four-faced linga (Caturmukha Mahādeva) which is certainly earlier in date than the temple itself'. 'To the east of the Gupta temple are the remains of another temple of Mahādeva of which only the foundations and the linga remain. The ground around is strewn with carved blocks of stone from which it appears that this temple was of the same date as the temple of the four-faced Mahādeva'.¹

The Nāgod State area, now included in the Baghelkhand Agency of Central India, appears to have been an early focus of Śaivism, and continued as such till medieval times. An ancient temple of Śiva exists at Bhumara, a village twelve miles to the west of the town of Unchehra in Nāgod State. It is flat-roofed and similar in all respects to the early Gupta temple at Nachna except that there is no upper chamber over the shrine. The similarity in size and plan and the nature of the carvings indicates that both the temples belong to the same age, probably the middle of the fifth century A.D. As in the case of the temple at Nachna, the mandapa has collapsed, but inside the shrine was found a huge ekamukha linga measuring a little more than six feet in height.²

f In the small hamlet of Sankargadh, in Nāgod State, there is, at the foot of a small conical hill, an ancient tank, now almost silted up, on the banks of which exist a very large collection of Śaiva sculptures and a very small stone temple of the later Gupta period. Two paved foot-paths lead to the door of the temple which stands on a mound, and on both sides of the foot-paths an unusually large number of lingas have been arranged. The temple consists of a single chamber with one door, and the interior of the shrine is perfectly plain, and contains a very large linga. The sikhara of the temple was added at a later date, perhaps in the 10th or 11th century, sculptures of which period are found scattered around the edifice. 'No inscriptions were discovered at the place, but from the technique the lower part of the temple can be assigned to the sixth century A.D.'. The images gathered around the shrine include a very fine image of Śiva and Pārvatī, and it is apparent from the carving that the sculpture belongs to the later Gupta period, i.e. 6th or 7th century A.D. There is besides a very large collection of images of Śiva and Pārvatī at this place, most of which belong to the 11th and 12th centuries A.D. Close by are the ruins of a large medieval temple of Śiva of the 11th or 12th century A.D. 'There must have been other temples also at this place, as in all some 15 or 20 lingas were discovered within a short area, some of which belong to the earlier periods, as they are natural Phallic symbols of the God of Destruction'

The villages of Khoh and Majhgawan, in Nāgod State, contain ruins extending over three miles in length, in which the remains of a large and once populous city lie buried. The biggest mound is the Ataria Khera where the remains of a Vaisnava temple were partly excavated by Cunningham, who discovered at the same place a fine image of the Boar Incarnation of Visnu. This area, too, seems to have been a centre of the Śaiva cult. A number of ekamukha lingas was found in the village and in the mounds surrounding it, and broken images of Mahīsamādinī were found both at Khoh and Majhgawan. More important is the neighbouring site known as Nakti-ka-Talai, which contains the remains of two fine stone-built temples of the early Gupta period. They are Śiva temples and stand side by side, hidden from view by thick bamboo groves. Here was also found one of the finest known ekamukha lingas, well-preserved and bearing the bust of Śiva on its western face. Śiva is represented with three eyes, and his crescent is carved in relief on the fore part of the mass of matted hair on the head. 'The face of this bust is a masterpiece of the plastic art of the early Gupta period'¹

The evidence of temples and sculptures shows that Śaivism was firmly established in certain areas of Central India in the Gupta period. In the tenth century and after, Śaivism was the prevailing religion in the area corresponding to Rewa State during the rule of the Cedi or Haihaya kings of Tripuri. Here are some important Śaiva monuments which claim our attention.

The territory of the Haihayas of Tripuri in the 10th-12th centuries was the Dāhala country or the modern district of Jubbulpur, but under the more powerful princes the Cedi kingdom included 'that portion of Central India which lies to the south of the river Tons, consisting of the modern States of Nagod, Maihar, the eastern part of Panna and the western part of the northern division of Rewa State'. The existing monuments of the Cedi country consist chiefly of Śaiva monasteries and temples, and are found for the most part in Rewa State and the district of Jubbulpur.² We have already referred to the influence of the Śaiva monks of the Mattamayūra line and their monasteries in the Cedi country. As regards temples, the remains are found chiefly in Rewa State at Chandrehe and Gurgi, not far from Rewa town, and at Bhurpur, Amarkantak and Sohagpur. The Śiva temple at Chandrehe was built about the middle of the tenth century A. D. It is the earliest specimen of the circular type of temples which came into vogue in this part of the country during the tenth century. The ruins of another temple of the same type were found near the village of Masaun in the neighbourhood of Gurgi, twelve miles due east of Rewa Town. Temples of this kind, with circular garbhagrhas, are extremely rare, and it has been suggested that 'this type of temple architecture was designed by the builders employed by the Śaiva monks of the Mattamayūra sect in the Cedi country. The Gurgi temple appears to belong to the same period as the one at Chandrehe which it closely resembles, and it is probable that it might be the Śiva temple which, according to the Gurgi inscription of Piabodhaśiva, was built by the abbot Praśāntasiva, close to the very high temple of Śiva built by Yuvarājadeva I, who ruled in the first half of the tenth century. The latter temple seems to have been built on the Gurgaj mound, at Gurgi, where 'the sites of two large temples are now marked by deep pits and the overturned colossal figures which were once enshrined inside'. The figures in question refer to a four-armed Durgā nine feet high, seated on a lion, and a still larger sculpture of Śiva and Pārvatī lying on its face, the slab being more than twelve feet long by more than five feet broad. 'If the temples which occupied this mound bore any proportion to the size of the colossal figures which they enshrined, they must have been of considerable size, certainly not less than 100 feet in height.'

Among other temples of the Cedi region may be mentioned that of Virāṭeśvara Śiva at Sohagpur, the Karan Mandir at the sacred site of Amarkantak, and the temple of Vaidyanātha Mahādeva at Baijnath, all in Rewa State. The Karan Mandir is a Śiva temple ascribed by local tradition to Karna Rāja, the powerful Haihaya king who ruled in the third quarter of the eleventh century A. D. It is a temple of rare design having three separate shrines, but it never was completed. 'The superb magnificence of such a temple with its three tall and profusely sculptured lofty towers of graceful outline can only be realised by actual sight'. Lastly, the Bheraghat inscription of Alhanādevī, the widow of king Gayākarna, issued in 1155 A. D., records the foundation of a temple of Śiva with a matha or monastery and a hall of study and gardens around them. 'This temple, or rather the lower part of its garbhagrha, still exists and is known by the name of the temple of Gaurīśamkara.' It stands on the summit of a hillock at Bheraghat, better known as the Marble Rocks, thirteen miles from Jubbulpur. The temple is located within the circular enclosure of the shrine of the Sixty-four Yoginīs of which we have spoken.¹

It will be thus seen that the early monuments of the Cedi country are almost exclusively devoted to the cult of Śiva. It is evident that at the time when Somadeva wrote, Śaivism was predominant in central India as in the south. We may now turn to Orissa.

ORISSA

Early medieval Orissa was an important centre of Śaivism¹. Bhuvaneśvara in the Puri District is the home of early temples dedicated to Śiva, the oldest being the Parasurāmesvara assigned to the eighth century A.D. The temple of Mukteśvara, famous for its sculptures representing scenes of religious life, for example, ascetics and disciples and the worship of Śiva, is somewhat later. The temple of Lingarāja, regarded as the most stupendous edifice of its kind in Orissa, is placed about the middle of the tenth century. Close to it is situated the small but exquisitely beautiful temple of Pārvatī, which is probably of the same date as its great neighbour. Other important Śaiva temples at Bhuvaneśvara include the Brahmeśvara (eleventh century), which stands on a platform with four smaller temples at the corners, and thus occupies a position similar to that of the temple of Gondesvara at Sinai, twenty miles from Nasik². The beautiful temple of Megheśvara situated close to the Brahmeśvara was built towards the end of the twelfth century, while the Śiva temple of Cāteśvara was built about the year 1220 A.D. in the village of Krishnapur in the Cuttack District³. It may be noted that the only architecturally important Vaisnava temple at Bhuvaneśvara is the Ananta-Vāsudeva said to have been built by Bhavadeva, a minister of king Harivarman of Eastern Bengal⁴. It cannot be much later than the great temple of Lingarāja.

Interesting early temples dedicated to Śiva exist also at Khiching, the old capital of the rulers of Mayurbhanj, and in Baudh State on the right bank of the Mahānadi. The twin temples at the village of Gandharādi, a few miles from Baudh Town, belong to the same style of architecture as the Parasurāmesvara at Bhuvaneśvara. If the Parasurāmesvara is assigned to the middle of the eighth century, the Gandharādi temples may be placed towards the close of that century. The two temples are exactly similar to each other: the one is dedicated to Siddheśvara Śiva with its sikhara surmounted by a Śivalinga, and the other is a Vaisnava shrine dedicated to Nīlamādhava, with a wheel of blue chlorite on the top of the sikhara. A wheel on the top of the sikhara is a common feature of Vaisnava temples, but the location of an entire Śivalinga on the top of a temple is something unknown in Orissan architecture.

Next in importance are the three Śiva temples, situated close to the modern temple of Rāmeśvara, in Baudh Town. They have been assigned to the ninth century. Beglar, who saw them in the last quarter of the 19th century, says 'though small they are gems of art in their own humble way.' R D Banerjea says 'The decorative motifs and the plastic art of the three temples at Baudh are certainly superior to and older than the great Lingarāja-Ananta-Vāsudeva group at Bhuvanesvara.' A peculiarity of the three temples in Baudh Town is that they have no Mandapa or Jagamohana, as it is called in Orissa, its place being taken by a porch over the entrance. Unfortunately the porch still exists only in one of the temples. Another peculiarity is that in plan the three temples are eight-rayed stars, and the arghapattas of the Lingas are also similar. The Baudh temples are no doubt older than the Lingarāja group at Bhuvanesvara, specially because the large Jagamohana had not yet come into vogue.¹

Khiching likewise was a prominent centre of Śaiva worship. It is about ninety miles from Bālipada, the present capital of Mayurbhanj, and the site represents the ruins of a large ancient city, which was the home of a people much more civilized than the present aboriginal inhabitants with a sprinkling of Oriya nationals. The principal shrine was that of Cāmundā known as Kiñcakesvaraī, and the Śiva temples that have survived are the Kutaitundi or Nilakantheśvara and the Candrasekhara which is still intact. The Śaiva sculptures discovered at Khiching (Umā-Maheśvara, the bust of Śiva etc.) bear testimony to the influence of the Śaiva cult in the area dominated by the culture of Khiching.² The architecture of the three Śiva temples in Baudh Town and those at Khiching is believed to represent an intermediate stage between such early specimens as the Paraśurāmeśvara and the Muktesvara at Bhuvanesvara and the twin temples at Gandharādi and the next phase of Orissan art as we find it in the temples of Lingarāja, Brahmeśvara and Anantavāsudeva at Bhuvanesvara. The Candrasekhara temple at Khiching has accordingly been assigned to about 900 A.D. A peculiarity of the temples at Khiching, as in the case of the three temples at Baudh, is that they are without any Mandapa or Jagamohana. As a matter of fact, there are certain temples at Bhuvanesvara also, for instance, the Bhāskareśvara, which have no Jagamohana. Some of them are believed to be older than the great temple of Lingarāja.

Most of the early Hindu temples in Orissa are thus dedicated to Śiva. The Paraśurāmeśvara at Bhuvanesvara is the earliest. The Gandharādi temples, although one of them is dedicated to Viṣṇu, come next, and the Muktesvara at Bhuvanesvara is placed at the end of the early period. All these edifices are characterized by spires or sikharas of which the curvature is much less pronounced than that of the sikharas of later temples, and in this respect they belong to the same category as such early temples in other parts of India as the later Gupta temple at Nachna Kuthara,³ the Daśāvatāra temple at Deogarh in Jhansi District and certain other temples at Aihole.⁴

4 "The Paraśurāmeśvara cannot be very far removed in date from the post-Gupta temple of the Daśāvatāra at Deogarh in the Jhansi District. The low regularly curving outlines of the temples at Gandharādi and the Paraśurāmeśvara belong

The predominance of the great Śaiva centre at Bhuvanesvara, or Āmīatīrtha, continued for centuries until it was eclipsed by the final establishment of the cult of Jagannātha at Puri. The great temple of Jagannātha at Puri (the Vimāna or the sanctum and the Jagamohana) was erected by Anantavarman Codaganga (1078-1148 A.D.) towards the close of the eleventh century, but the architectural style is considered to be degenerate in comparison with the classic examples of Orissan art at Bhuvanesvara. The Eastern Gangas of Kalinga extended their rule over the whole of Orissa in the second half of the eleventh century. But their tutelary deity was Gokarnasvāmin, or Gokarnesvara Śiva, who is so often mentioned in their inscriptions, and whose shrine was located on the top of the Mahendra mountain in Ganjam District. Vajrahasta (1038-68 A.D.), the grandfather of Anantavarman Codaganga, is called parama-māhesvara or a devout worshipper of Śiva in one of his inscriptions. Nevertheless the establishment of the temple of Jagannātha at Puri was a turning-point in the religious history of Orissa. A famous Vaiṣṇava scholar, Naraharīrtha, a disciple of Ānandatīrtha, the founder of the Mādhva school, was the regent of Orissa for twelve years during the minority of Narasimha II (1278-1306 A.D.), and built the temple of Yogānanda-Narasimha at Śrī-Kurṁam in Chikakole Taluka of the Ganjam District in 1281 A.D. Other inscriptions recording gifts by Naraharīrtha have been found in the temple of Kūrmeśvara at Śrī-kurṁam and that of Lakṣmī-Narasimhasvāmin at Simhācalam near Waltair. The final triumph of Vaiṣṇavism, or rather Neo-Vaiṣṇavism, in Orissa was not, however, achieved until long after the fall of the Eastern Gangas. The new empire of Orissa extending from Medinipur to Trichinopoly was built up by Kapaḥḍendra (1435-70), who liberally patronized the great temple at Puri. His successor Puruṣottama (1470-97) added the Bhogamandapa to the temple of Jagannātha. It was during the reign of his successor Pratāparudra (1497-1541) that Neo-Vaiṣṇavism became paramount in the religious life of Orissa owing to the long residence of the Bengali saint Caitanyadeva in the country and his powerful influence on the king and the people. Unfortunately, as ably demonstrated by R. D. Banerjea, the supremacy of the new Vaiṣṇavism in Orissa coincided with the political downfall of the country, and "the acceptance of Vaiṣṇavism or rather Neo-Vaiṣṇavism was the real cause of the Musalman conquest of Orissa twenty-eight years after the death of Pratāparudra." So far as the equilibrium of faiths was concerned, the predominance of to the same type as the Śikhara of the Deogadh temple and the later temple at Nachna Kuthara. Sometime during the course of the 9th century A.D., temple types in Orissa began to change and the Śikhara grew taller. It was at this time that the curve of the spire became abrupt near the Āmalaka. The only known examples of this type are the three small temples in Baudh town. JBORS, Vol. XV, p. 80. The Dasavatāra temple at Devagadh on the Vetraṇatī river is believed to be a monument of the Gupta age (early fifth century A.D.). It was dedicated to Viṣṇu whose image must have been installed in the sanctum. A short inscription in Gupta Brāhmī characters on a big square pillar refers to the gift (dāna) of Bhāgavata Govinda, obviously the founder of the temple. See Dr. V. S. Agrawala's paper on the temple in Art and Thought (Luzac, 1947), p. 51.

the cult of Jagannātha inevitably led to the decay of the older cults of Śiva at Bhuvanesvara and elsewhere

In the tenth century or thereabouts the Śaiva centre at Bhuvanesvara appears to have been as important as any other centre of Śaiva worship in Central or Western or South India. About this time Bhuvanesvara was included in the dominions of the Somavamśi kings, who at first ruled in the Eastern part of Mahākosala corresponding to the Chattisgarh Division of Central Provinces, and later extended their control over portions of northern and central Orissa. These kings appear to have been Śaivas. Mahābhavagupta Janamejaya who appears to have reigned at the beginning of the tenth century is described in one of his charters as a devout worshipper of Śiva. His successor Mahāśivagupta Yayāti is probably the same as the king Yayāti-Keśari who, according to Orissan tradition, built the massive temple of Lingarāja at Bhuvanesvara. As we have seen, even on architectural grounds, this edifice has been assigned to the tenth century. Similarly, the temple of Brahmesvara at Bhuvanesvara is said to have been built by the mother of Udyotakeśari, described as seventh in descent from Janamejaya, probably the same as Mahābhavagupta Janamejaya. The temple thus appears to have been erected in the early part of the eleventh century¹

Among the kings of earlier dynasties who ruled in different parts of Orissa, Śagguyayana of the Māna dynasty, who reigned in Southern Tosali or Tosala (the area to the south of the Chilka lake), is described as paramamahesvara or devout worshipper of Śiva in an inscription issued by his feudatory Śivarāja in the Gupta year 283 = 603 A.D.² The early Karas who ruled over Central Orissa in the eighth century A.D. were Buddhists. Among the later Karas, the queen Tribhuvana Mahādevī is described as a devout worshipper of Viṣṇu, while the Hindol plate of Śubhakarā II records the grant of a village in Northern Tosali or Tosala (the area around Bhuvanesvara and Puri) for the benefit of the temple of Pulindeśvara and the maintenance of Śaiva ascetics.³ Among the Bhañja chiefs of Khirñjali⁴ who ruled in the eighth and ninth centuries, Śatrubhañja, one of whose grants was issued in 744 A.D., and his successor Ranabhañja I are described in their inscriptions as worshippers of Viṣṇu, but Netrbhañja, the son of Ranabhañja I, is called a devout worshipper of Śiva.⁵ The tutelary deity of these Bhañjas was Stambheśvarī who appears to have been a tribal goddess like Maniyādevī of Bundelkhand (see above), or the more famous Vindhyaśinī Devī worshipped by the Śābaras. The cult of these goddesses was, as a rule, affiliated to the Tantric aspect of medieval

From Orissa we may pass on to the Deccan which was one of the earliest centres of Śaivism in India. Most of the Vākātaka kings, who ruled in the area corresponding to Central Provinces and Berar in the fourth and fifth centuries A D, are described in their inscriptions as paramā-śhesvara or fervent devotees of Śiva¹ One of them, Rudrasena I, who reigned in the first half of the fourth century A D, is described as a devotee of Mahābhairava, which shows that Śiva was worshipped in both his benign and terrible forms

The Vākātakas were related by marriage to the Bhāraśivas who are variably mentioned in the initial portion of the inscriptions of the former autami-putra, the son of Pravarasena I, married the daughter of the hāraśiva king Bhavanāga, and the issue of this marriage was Rudrasena I The Bhāraśivas seem to have carved out a principality for themselves on the banks of the Ganges, as they are described as having had their coronation bath with the pure waters of the Ganges acquired by their valour These Bhāraśivas were staunch Śaivas, as they are described as having pleased Śiva by carrying the śivalinga on their shoulders,² resembling in this respect the Vīrasaivas or Lingayats of later times It is possible that they originally belonged to the Deccan and later established themselves in North India³

The Vākātakas must have built shrines dedicated to Śiva, but none of them is known to have survived Rudrasena I is said to have built a dharmasthāna, probably in honour of Mahābhairava It is also possible that the ancient flat-roofed temple at Tigowā near Bahuribandh in the Jabalpur District was dedicated to Śiva, like the flat-roofed temple at Bhumara in Nāgod State⁴

It may be noted that the cult of Viṣṇu was patronized by two of the Vākātaka kings Unlike his predecessors, Rudrasena II worshipped Lakṣmī (Viṣṇu), probably under the influence of his wife Prabhāvatīguptā, the daughter of the Gupta emperor Candragupta II (380-414 A D), while Prthivīśena II, the last known king of the elder branch of the Vākātaka dynasty, who reigned in the second half of the fifth century A D, is described as a parama-bhāgavata or fervent worshipper of Viṣṇu in the Bālāghāt plates. The sacred hill of Rāmāgiri with the footprints of Rāma on its slopes, made famous by Kālidāsa in his Meghadūta, was a holy spot in the Vākātaka age, and is mentioned as such in the Riddhapuri plates of Prabhāvatiguptā which were issued from Rāmāgiri¹. Similarly, the Pattan plates of Pravarasena II (first half of the 5th century A.D.) record the grant of a village called Asvatthakhetaka for the maintenance of a charity hall in honour of the foot-prints of Mahāpurusa, evidently Viṣṇu or Rāma². It should, however, be noted that Pravarasena II himself is described as a parama-māhesvara or a fervent devotee of Śiva in Vākātaka inscriptions.

Further light on the prominent position of Śaivism in ancient Deccan is thrown by an inscription of the early Rāstrakūṭa king Abhimanyu issued at Mānapura. It records the grant of a village called Undikavātikā to a recluse named Jātābhāia in honour of the god Daksina-Śiva of Pethapangaraka. It was formerly thought that Daksina Śiva might be the deity of the great Śaiva shrine in the Mahadeva Hills in the Hoshangabad District of Central Provinces, and Pethapangaraka might be Pagāia, the headquarters of the Zamin-dari of that name. Mānapura could be Mānapura in Malwa, about twelve miles south-west of Mhow, or Mānapura near Bandhogai in Rewa State. But, as suggested by Prof. Muashi, it is much more probable that the Mānapura mentioned in the inscription of Abhimanyu is identical with Mān, the chief sub-division of the Sātārā District of Bombay Province, through which flows the Māngangā, a tributary of the Bhīmā. It is noteworthy that an inscription of Avidheya, another king of the same family, records the grant of a 1 'गमगिरिन्वामिन पदमूलत्' Rāmāgiri is now Rāmtēk, a wellknown place of pilgrimage near Nagpur. At present the centre of interest is the group of temples on the hill overlooking the town. The temple of Rāmācandra, about 500 feet above the town, is the most prominent. The others are dedicated to Lakṣmana, Kausalyā, Satya Nārāyaṇa, Lakṣmī Nārāyaṇa, Hanumān etc. The temple of Harihara is popularly known as the Dasaratha temple. There are also two temples with huge idols of Narasiṃha and the remains of a very old temple of the Dwarf incarnation called Trivikrama. One of the temple courts contains a huge image of the Boar Incarnation under a small flat roofed shrine. An inscription on a wall of the temple of Lakṣmana contains the names of two kings of the Haihaya family who reigned in Mahākosala (modern Chattisgarh) in the latter part of the fourteenth century A.D., and so gives a clue to the age of the building. It is noteworthy that the aforesaid inscription refers to several Śaiva temples, such as Ghantesvara, Sudhesvara, Kedāra, Ambikānātha, Dharmesvara, Muktisvara etc. Besides, there is a Śivaliṅga called Dhūmresvara Mahādeva, to whom offerings are made by pilgrims before worshipping Rāma. The linga is believed to represent Sambuka, the Śūdra ascetic killed by Rāma. The presence of the Śivaliṅga in front of the temple of Rāma and the enumeration of Śiva temples in the inscription mentioned above would seem to indicate the existence of a Śaiva cult prior to the foundation of the existing Vaiṣṇava temples. It may also be noted that the group of temples on the hill includes two temples dedicated to Mahisāsura-mardini, and down the hill is a temple of Candikā built of massive blocks of hewn stone. village called Pāṇḍarāṅgapallī situated on the bank of the Ane river, which is most probably identical with the Yennā, or the Venā, which rises on the Mahābalesvara plateau and falls into a valley to the east of the Mahābalesvara hill in the Sātārā District. As regards the shrine of Dakṣiṇa-Sīva mentioned in the records of Abhimanyu, there are several Śaiva temples on the summit of hills in the Sātārā District, the best known being that of Mahābalesvara not far from the source of the Kṛṣṇā. Mānapura was no doubt founded by Mānāṅka, the first king of the family, who is mentioned in both the inscriptions, and Abhimanyu and Avidheya were apparently ruling over the territory corresponding to the Sātārā District of Bombay Province. The inscriptions in question have been assigned to the fifth century A.D. on paleographic grounds, and genealogical considerations have led to Mānāṅka being placed in the last quarter of the fourth century and Abhimanyu towards the end of the fifth century A.D.¹ The rulers of Mānapura, or the Rāstrakūṭas of Mānapura, as they have been called, were thus contemporaries of the Vākātakas, and appear to have been, like them, worshippers of Śiva. As for the cult of Viṣṇu, it no doubt existed in the Vākātaka age, but seems to have occupied a secondary place, and similar conditions appear to be reflected in the subsequent history of the Deccan.

Saivism played a decisive rôle in the temple architecture of the Deccan² and the adjoining countries. The early Čālukyas were mostly followers of the Vaiṣṇava cult. The Vaiṣṇava cave at Badami in the Bijapur district was excavated in 578 A.D. under Kūtivarman I, while his brother Mangaliśa who succeeded him upon the throne is described as a parama-bhāgavata. There is also no doubt that some of the ancient temples at Aihole, now a village, about twelve miles due east of Badami, were dedicated to Viṣṇu.³ But, towards the beginning of the eighth century A.D., the Čālukyas show a decided leaning to Śaivism, and seem to have become worshippers of Śiva. It is about this time that Pattadakal, now a small village, about ten miles east of Badami, emerges as an important religious centre with Saivism playing a dominant rôle. Three Śaiva temples of considerable size were built here, the oldest being the massive temple of Vijayeśvara, now called that of Sangamesvara built by Vijayāditya (696-733 A.D.). Of the other two, the temple of Virūpākṣa (Lokeśvara) is the largest and the most important of the old temples in the Kanarese districts. It was built by Lokamahādevī, the queen consort of Vikramāditya II (733-746 A.D.), in commemoration of his having thrice conquered Kāñcī or Conjeveram. 'Including the eastern and western gateways, the building measures 250 feet over all, of which the main building occupies a length of 120 feet'. Within the great hall are eighteen heavy square pillars, decorated with sculptures representing scenes from the Rāmāyana and the Mahābhārata. Close to the temple of Virūpākṣa is that of Trailokyēśvara, which has been identified with the temple of Trailokyēśvara.

erected by the younger queen of Vikramāditya II, named Trailokyamahādevī, a sister of Lokamahādevī. The general plan and design are the same as in Virūpākṣa, but many parts of this temple have been left unfinished. The temples of Vijayesvara, Virūpākṣa and Trailokyēśvara form an imposing group, and an inscription which gives us information about these three temples is engraved upon a great column which stands upon the north side of Virūpākṣa. It was erected by a sculptor, named Śubhadeva, for a Śaiva teacher named Jñānasīva who had come from a place on the north bank of the Ganges, in 754 A. D., during the reign of Kirtivarma II. There are certain other old Śaiva temples at Pattadakal, such as those of Kāśivīśvanātha, Gaḷaganātha and Kālasiddhesvara, but they are smaller in size, and of uncertain date, and there exist also the remains of two other temples of the same class, namely, Jambhulinga and Candrasekhara. Far more important is the large ornate temple of Pāpanātha, which cannot be later than that of Virūpākṣa, but seems to have been dedicated to Viṣṇu, as shown by the Garuda emblem over the shrine door. There are, however, indications that it was, at a later date, converted to Śaiva worship.¹

Śiva temples are found also at Badami, in the south-east corner of the Bijapur district, the former Vātāpi, a capital of the early Cālukyas. The oldest and the best preserved is the Mālegitti-śivalaya, 'the Śaiva shrine of the female Garland-maker,' 56 feet in length, and of the same style as the older temples at Aihole. 'It is a complete Dravidian temple. All its parts are heavy and massive and well proportioned to one another.' It seems to have been originally dedicated to Viṣṇu, with that deity in the ceiling, and Garuda on the lintel of the shrine doorway. Another interesting temple at Badami is the smaller one of Lakuliśa, an incarnation of Śiva, whose image is seated upon the altar in the shrine, and represented nude as usual. Badami possesses yet another old Śaiva temple, that of Virūpākṣa, which is still in use.

In a secluded glen between Pattadakal and Badami is the temple of Mahākūtesvara, which may be ascribed to the early part of the sixth century A. D., as an inscription of 601 A. D., engraved on a column found near the temple, records an additional grant made in continuation of a previous endowment of the god Śiva under the name of Makuteśvaranātha. Another temple, which, on the grounds of style and 'more cyclopean-looking masonry', is regarded as older than the seventh century A. D., is that of Huchchimalli-Guḍi at Aihole. Unfortunately 'the interior of the shrine has been totally wrecked, portions of the linga and the paving of the floor lying about in great confusion'. An inscription of 708 A. D., upon the front of the temple, records a grant of oil to the priest of the temple by the Cālukya king Vijayāditya, the builder of the Vijayēśvara temple

1 'There is a dvārapāla, four-armed, on either side of the shrine door. In the upper left hand of the south figure is a triśūla, but it has been made of plaster, evidently after the temple was converted to Śaiva worship'. There is also the tāṇḍava sculpture on the face of the tower. On the other hand, 'the astadīpāla ceiling, in the centre of the hall, has Viṣṇu reclining upon Śeṣa as its central panel instead of the tāṇḍava of Śiva which is usual in such ceilings found in Śaiva temples'.

The Cālukyas were supplanted by the Rāstrakūtas about the middle of the eighth century A D The latter achieved little in the way of building structural temples, but they 'had their own works in hand in the north, notably the great excavations at Elūrā, which extended from the Daśa Avatāra cave to the extensive group of Jaina caves around the Indra and Jagannāth Sabhās' These included the great monolithic temple of Kailāsa, dedicated to Śiva, which appears to have been excavated at Elūrā or Ellora, about fourteen miles northwest of Aurangabad, during the reign of Kṛṣṇa I who ruled between 756 and 775 A D He is described as having built many temples of Śiva, resembling the Kailāsa mountain, and, it was under the orders of this monarch that a most marvellous Śiva temple, evidently the great Kailāsa temple, is said to have been constructed on the hill at Elāpura (Elūrā)¹ The Kailāsa resembles the temple of Virūpākṣa (Lokesvara) at Pattadakal in plan and details, although the former is hewn out of the solid rock, and the latter is built in the ordinary way on level ground There is similarity even in the sculptures on the two temples, representing scenes from the Rāmāyana and the Mahābhārata 'In Lokesvara they occur upon the broad bands round the shafts of the great columns of the hall, while on Kailāsa they are sculptured in narrow bands on the wall of the basement below the porch'. 'Another unusual representation is that of the Śiva-linga with Brahmā and Viṣṇu beside it, which is found, in both cases, on the front of the temple' The Kailāsa, in spite of its marvellous technique, and the more graceful treatment of its details, thus appears to be modelled on Virūpākṣa, and it is probable that the Rāstrakūtas copied the Cālukyan building art when they had overthrown the dynasty, just as the Cālukyas themselves had copied the Dravidian architecture of the south when they had carried their victorious arms to Kāñcī or Conjeveram² Unlike other cave-temples, the Kailāsa, once gorgeously painted, stands, isolated from the surrounding rock, 'in a great court averaging 154 feet wide by 276 long at the level of the base, entirely cut out of the solid rock, and with a scarp 107 feet high at the back'³ The bewildering amount of labour and technical skill expended on the celebrated temple bears eloquent testimony to the importance which the Śaiva cult had attained in the Deccan in the Rāstrakūta age

The Ellora group of cave temples includes, besides the Kailāsa, other shrines dedicated to Śiva such as the large cave north of Kailāsa (XVII), and Caves XXII (Nīlakantha), XXIII and XXVI Far more important is Cave XXI, a lofty Śaiva temple, locally known as Rāmeśvara 'The hall is 15½ feet high and measures 69 feet by 251 with a chapel at each end, cut off by two cushion-capital pillars' Cave XXIX is known as Sītā's

Nādhām, or Dumar Lena 'The great hall, including the shrine, is 148 feet wide by 149 deep, and 17 feet 8 inches high, but the excavation extends to about 240 feet from north to south' This cave is remarkably similar to the great Śaiva cave temple at Elephanta, 'but it is larger and in some respects finer it is also, perhaps, later in age' The shrine is a small square room containing a linga, with four doors, each guarded by a pair of gigantic dhārāpālas

Elephanta is a small island near Bombay, about seven miles to the north-east of Apollo Bandar, and the great cave temple of Śiva hewn out of the living rock is on the north face of the western hill The cave consists of a central hall and four vestibules, and measures about 130 feet in length, the breadth being approximately the same The roof is supported by massive columns varying in height from 15 to 17 feet These originally numbered twenty-six, of which eight have collapsed The cave is remarkable for its colossal sculptures representing Śiva in his various forms including Natarāja, Gangādharā and Ardhanārīśvara But the most striking sculpture in the cave is the huge panel consisting of a triple-headed bust of Śiva, which rises to a height of 17 feet 10 inches above a moulded base, nearly 3 feet high The image stands in a recess 10½ feet deep, 'within which the heads emerge cliff-like from the native rock'

The triple head represents three aspects of Śiva Tatpuruṣa (the supreme Mahādeva) in the middle, and Vāmadeva (the Beautiful) and Aghora (the Terrible) on the sides The image of Mahādeva 'dominates the whole assemblage It is the concrete form of Śiva whose linga is worshipped in the adjacent shrine The plan of the rock-cut temple was thus adjusted to the image, the entire hall is laid out in front of it in its deep recess The stage is set for that form (rūpa) of His who is beyond form, and who pervades the universe, which thus is His visible body'²

The cave-temple at Elephanta has generally been assigned to the latter part of the eighth century A D, and is probably of the same age as the excavations at Ellora, which fall in the Rāstrakūṭa period The close resemblance between the Dumar Lena at Ellora and the Elephanta cave has attracted the attention of observers, while pillars with 'compressed cushion capitals' have been found both in Elephanta and some of the cave temples at Ellora But the simple grandeur of the Elephanta sculptures in striking contrast to the complex and grotesque multiplicity of those at Ellora suggests a somewhat earlier date for the former, possibly the seventh century A D³ In the tenth century A D, Ellora and Elephanta must have been great centres

Apart from the Ellora and the Elephanta cave-temples, there were no doubt other temples dedicated to Śiva in existence during the Rāstrakūta period. It was in a Śiva temple that Govinda III (794-814 A.D.) deposited the two statues sent by the king of Ceylon as a token of submission.¹ 'The custom of founding a Śiva temple in commemoration of a dead ancestor, and of naming the deity after the person to be commemorated, had already become prevalent in our period. Hebbal inscription, dated 975 A.D., refers to a temple of Bhujjabbesvara built to commemorate Bhubbarasi, the grand-mother of the Ganga ruler Mārasimha II'.² It may be noted that Śiva temples existed in Mysore during the Rāstrakūta period. The religion of the Gangas was Jainism, but they were liberal in their outlook, and some of the early kings favoured the worship of Śiva, for example, Tadangāla Mādhava and Avinīta (circa 5th-6th century A.D.). A considerable number of Śiva temples seems to have been built during the rule of the later Gangas who were contemporaries of the Rāstrakūtas. Notable among these are the shrine of Bhoganandīśvara at the foot of the Nandi hills, Someśvara at Gangavaiṇpalli, Kapileśvara at Manne etc.³ The construction of so many temples for the worship of Śiva proves the prevalence of Śaivism side by side with Jainism in Mysore, although under the Gangas the latter was the more influential and favoured religion.

Śaiva temples were constructed or maintained, on a wide scale, during the reign of the Cālukyas of Kalyani, as shown by the various grants and endowments recorded in their inscriptions. For example, an inscription of 980 A.D. belonging to the reign of Taila II is the subject of an endowment made for the benefit of the temple of Suvarnākṣi, a form of Śiva, styled as Śamkara-Svayambhū-Suvarnamahākṣi, at Soval (Sogal in the Belgaum district).⁴ An inscription of 1064 A.D.⁵ records the grant of an endowment to the temple of Kesaveśvara at Pottiyūr (Hottūr), another of 1074 A.D.⁶ deals with the grant of a town for the maintenance of the sanctuary of Rāmesvara at Pomballi (Hombli), while the temple of Mahā-Svayambhū-

Portuguese annalist Diogo de Couto writing in the opening years of the 17th century says that the interior of the temple had formerly been covered with a coat of lime mixed with bitumen and other compositions that made the temple bright and very beautiful and worth seeing, and the features and workmanship were such that 'neither in silver or wax could such figures be engraved with greater nicety, fineness or perfection'. Unfortunately it was during Portuguese occupation that the temple was damaged and the figures sadly mutilated. Somanātha, 'the Somanātha of the South', at Purikara (Puligere, the modern Lakshmeshwar), (all in the Dharwar district), is referred to in several inscriptions belonging to the first half of the twelfth century A D¹ Further, an inscription of the reign of Soyī Deva, the son of Bijjala, records endowments made in 1172 A D for the temples of Śiva-Somanātha (Rāya-Murāli-Somanātha) and Bijjeśvara at Mālige (Mādagihāl in Jat State, near Bijapur)²

Apart from inscriptional evidence, there exists a large number of surviving specimens of later Cālukyan Śaiva temples, ranging from the tenth century to the end of the twelfth, mostly in the Dharwar district and the immediate neighbourhood.³ In fact, it will be no exaggeration to say that later Cālukyan architecture was almost entirely devoted to the glorification of the Śaiva faith. The advent of the later Cālukyas under Taila II, towards the end of the tenth century, gave a fresh impetus to temple building, and it is from this time that we notice a gradual transformation of the earlier Dravidian style, till what is known as the Cālukyan style came into existence. In the first place, the earlier building material, the rougher grained sandstone, was abandoned in favour of 'the more compact, tractable, and finer grained black stone known as chloritic schist, which dresses down to a much finer surface, and has enabled the sculptors to produce so much of that beautiful, delicate, lacelike tracery which characterises the later work. In the second place, there was a diminution in the size of the masonry, the heavy cyclopean blocks of the early temples being discarded in favour of much smaller ones. Finally, the storied or horizontal arrangement of the towers, a prominent characteristic of the Dravidian style found in the early temples, became obliterated by a great profusion of ornamental detail, and underwent a process of approximation to the vertical bands up the centre of each face of the Northern tower. The transition from the earlier to this later style, evolved about the tenth and eleventh centuries, is seen in the Śaiva temple of Kalleśvara at Kukkanūr⁴ and the Jaina temple at Lakkundi⁵, while that of Kāśiśiśveśvara at the latter place shows a further marked development of the Cālukyan tower. On a beam in the hall of the latter building is an inscription, dated in the thirteenth year of the reign of the later Cālukya king Vikramāditya VI, which corresponds to 1087 A D⁶. One of the finest of existing Cālukyan temples 'probably the finest temple in the Kanarese districts, after Halebid,' is that of Mahādeva in the small village of Ittagi, in the Nizām's territory, about twenty-two miles due east of Gadag in the Dharwar district. 'It measures, over all, 120 feet by 66 feet,' and consists of a shrine, with its antechamber, a closed and a great open hall at the east end, which was originally supported upon sixty-eight pillars. The temple is mentioned in an inscription of 1112 A D, which tells us that it was founded, as a temple of Śiva, under the name Mahādevēśvara, by Mahādeva, the daṇḍa-nāyaka, or general, of Vikramāditya VI (1075-1125 A D). He founded also a temple of Nārāyaṇa, and other Śaiva shrines such as those of Candālesvara and Bhairava.¹

One of the largest Śaiva temples of the Cālukyan period, in the Dharwar district, is that of Tārakeśvara, in the town of Hāṅgal, 'chiefly remarkable for the magnificent dome which covers the central portion of the great hall,' the roof of which is supported upon fifty-two pillars. The temple of Kaithabhesvara at Ānavatti, in Maisur, just across the border from the Dharwar district, is distinguished by its unusually lofty hall, the pillars being massive in proportion. The temple of Daksina-Kedāresvara at Balagāmve is now shorn of its importance, but it was a great educational centre, of which we have already spoken. Śaiva temples of the Cālukyan period are found also at Chaudadāmpur (Muktesvara), Hāveri (Siddhesvara), Haralhalli (Somesvara), and Rattehalli (Kadambesvara), all in the Dharwar district.

The temple of Kadambeśvara contains an inscription which records a grant to it in 1174 A D for repairing the building. Inscriptions dating from 899 to 1262 A D are engraved on several slabs standing beside the temple at Chaudadāmpur, the later ones recording grants and gifts to the god of the temple under the names of Mukteśvara and Muktinātha.

The temple of Madhukeśvara at Banavāsi, a very ancient place, now a village, eighteen miles south by west from Hāṅgal, belongs to the eleventh century, as one of the inscribed slabs in and around the temple records a grant in the year 1068 A D. The so-called Temple of the Sixty Columns, now in a ruined state, at Bankapur, and that of Triakūteśvara at Gadag, both in the Dharwar district, may also be ascribed to the eleventh century. The former temple contains inscriptions upon either side of the shrine door, recording grants made to the god Nāgareśvara in 1138 and 1091 A. D. Similarly, one of the inscriptions collected together at the temple of Triakūteśvara records a grant made in 1062 A D in the time of Āhavamalla II.² Cālukyan temples are found also in the Bellary district of the Madras Presidency, and most of them are dedicated to Śiva (Kalleśvara, Katteśvara, Bhīmeśvara etc.).³ There is no doubt that the inspiration derived from Saivism helped the building art of the Cālukyas and the technical competence of their craftsmen to give a distinctive stamp to Indian culture in the Deccan.

Even in the northern part of the Deccan, outside the sphere of the Cālukyas, we find a preponderance of temples dedicated to Śiva.⁴ The most ornate of the temples in the Deccan style is that at the village of Ambarnātha, about four miles south-east of Kalyan, in the Thana district. 'This chef-d'oeuvre of the builder's art' was built for the worship of Śiva in 1060 A.D., during the reign of the Śilāhāra chief Mummuni or Māmvaṇi. The temple measures 89 feet by 73½ feet, and is made up of the sanctum and mandapa or hall, the latter being provided with three entrances, each with its own porch. The temples in the Deccan style are not remarkable for their size, that of Gondesvaia or Govindeśvaia at Sinnar, twenty miles south of Nasik, being about the largest now standing. It is a pañcāyatana temple forming a group of five shrines, the central main temple being dedicated to Śiva, and the four small surrounding shrines to Viṣṇu, Gaṇapati and others. It is supposed to have been built by Rāva Govinda, and 'it is possible it may be named after Govindarāja, one of the Yādava princes, who ruled about the beginning of the 12th century'. Another temple, that of Mahesvaia, at Pātnā, ten miles to the south-west of Chalisgaon in Khandesh, was completed by a chief Govana, of the Nīkumbha family, who was ruling in that locality under the Yādavas in 1153 A.D.¹

To sum up, the temple architecture of the Deccan bears testimony to the paramount character of Śaivism in that region from about the eighth century to the end of the twelfth. No other faith, whether Vaiṣṇavism or Jainism, during this period, found so elaborate an expression in the building art of the time.

SOUTH INDIA

From Deccan we may turn to South India properly so called. The classic land of Śaivism was the Tamil country which witnessed one of the greatest epochs of the faith. Śaivism is prevalent in South India even today, and it is said that the Saivas form the bulk of the population in the districts of Tinnevely, Madura, Trichinopoly, Tanjore, South Arcot, Chingleput, Madras, North Arcot, Salem and Coimbatore, and are also found in large numbers in certain parts of Ceylon, Malabar and Travancore, in short, wherever Tamil is the prevailing tongue.² Going back to early times, we find sixty-three canonized saints known as Nāyanmars or Adiyārs, who are the real founders of Śaivism in South India. Included among them is Koccenganān, one of the Cola kings mentioned in early Tamil literature. He must have flourished long before the seventh century when he had already become a legendary figure. The importance of Koccenganān lies in the fact that he appears to have been one of the earliest builders of Śiva temples in the Tamil country. The Vaiṣṇava Ālvār Tirumangai, who lived about the middle of the eighth century, says in one of his hymns that the king built seventy beautiful shrines dedicated to Śiva, besides offering worship to Viṣṇu at Tirunarayūr. He is also described as having founded other temples to Śiva in the hymns of Sambandar and Sundaramūti.³

1 An old temple of Śiva called Mallikāryūna exists at Nagansur in Akalkot State, near Sholapur in Bombay Province. It is built in the Cālukyan style, popularly known as Hemādpanṭi, and, like all temples built in this style, it has an open porch in front of the mandapa which is supported by four elaborately carved pillars. A temple of Śiva, apparently of the later Cālukyan period, was discovered and excavated under the inner wall of the old fort at Sholapur. Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of India, Western Circle, 1919, p. 59, 1920, p. 74.

3 Sastri The Colas, Vol. I, p. 67.

The chronology of the Adiyāis has not been settled in all its details, but the saint Appar and his younger and more influential contemporary Sambandar are known to have lived in the first half of the seventh century A D. Sambandar was a contemporary of another Śaiva devotee, Siruttondar, who was the general of the Pallava king Narasimhavarmān I, and conquered with him Vātapi, the Chālukyan capital, about 642 A D¹ The next important saint, Sundaramūrti, has been assigned to the early part of the ninth century A D. The saint Śeramān Perumāi was a contemporary of Sundaramūrti²

The hymns composed by Appar, Sambandar and Sundaramūrti form the first seven sections of the Śaiva canonical literature in Tamil. Of the eleven sections of this literature, the first three contain the hymns of Sambandar, and the next three those of Appar, while the seventh is composed of the hymns of Sundaramūrti. These seven sections, or rather collections, constitute the group known as the Tevāram³. The eighth section contains the famous Tiruvāsakam of the great saint and poet Mānikkavāsagar. He has been assigned to various dates, but it is almost certain that he is considerably earlier than the seventh century, as Appar refers to a well-known miracle associated with his life, and mentions a Vācaka who seems to be identical with the saint⁴. The hymns of the Adiyāis give fervid expression to intense, self-effacing devotion to Śiva, and proclaim absolute faith in His abounding grace and beneficent mission. Their religious fervour and spiritual depth represent an early phase of Śaivism of which the keynote is bhakti.

Tamil Śaivism has an important bearing on the religious conflict, to which we have referred in this work. Here, Śaivism was in open conflict with Jainism, and the antagonism was far more deep-rooted than in the Deccan, where the Jaina faith continued to be in a favoured position until long after its discomfiture at Kāñci and Madura. In the Tamil country Jainism lost effective royal patronage as early as the seventh century A D. when it had only commenced to obtain royal favour in the Deccan, for example, under Pulakesi II. The great Pallava king Mahendavarman I was converted from Jainism to the Śaiva faith by Appar in the first quarter of the seventh century A D. The Śaiva saint had been persecuted by Mahendra, but, after his conversion, the king became an ardent champion of the new faith, and is said to have demolished the Jaina monastery at Pātaliputtinam, a seat of Jaina learning in the South Arcot district, and built a Śiva temple on the spot⁵. Appar himself was born a Śaiva, became a Jaina and leader of the Jaina settlement at Pātali (now the modern town of Cuddalore), and later reverted to his former religion.⁶ Further to the south, Kūn Pāndya of Madura was similarly converted from Jainism to the Śaiva faith by the saint Sambandar, and this king has been identified with Arikesari Māravarman who commenced his reign about the middle of the seventh century A D¹ The conversion of Kūṇ Pandya and Mahendravarman I may be regarded as a turning point in the history of Śaivism in South India, as it meant practically the elimination of Jainism as a serious rival. But the story of the persecution of the Jainas, eight thousand of whom are said to have been cruelly put to death at Madura at the instigation of Sambandar, is probably an exaggeration for which the Tamil Purāṇas are responsible² Sambandar was, however, noted for his anti-Jaina zeal, as he has given vent to his implacable hatred of the Jainas in all his hymns³ The rancour against the Jainas lurked in various legends, one of which recounts, for instance, that these heretics once sent an elephant to destroy the city of Madura, but Śiva petrified the beast in the form of the neighbouring Ānamalai hill⁴

The Śaiva Aḍiyārs as well as the Vaisnava Ālvārs were assiduous in combating heresy in the Tamil land. Māṇikkavāśagar turned against the Buddhists, whom he defeated in argument at Chidambaram and thereafter converted to the Śaiva faith. He was a high officer of the Pāṇḍya king of the time until he renounced the world at the call of Śiva, and it is possible that Pāṇḍyan rule included Chidambaram in his day. The dialectical triumph of Māṇikkavāśagar was repeated by Sambandar at Madura, but his opponents were the Jainas, who refused to adopt the Śaiva faith despite their humiliation⁵ Thus, while the earlier saint was an antagonist of the Buddhists, the efforts of Sambandar were directed against Jainism, and, it may be assumed that the hostility of so influential a leader of religious opinion contributed towards the retrogression of the Jaina faith in the South. The rôle of Appar in this conflict of religions was no less important, as the conversion of Mahendravarman I gave to Śaivism one of its greatest patrons and protagonists. The decline of Jainism in the Tamil country was thus largely due to the loss of royal patronage and popular support brought about by the influence and missionary zeal of the leading Śaiva saints; The process of decay, far-reaching as it was, must have been gradual, as references to Jaina temples and images are occasionally found in the records of the succeeding centuries. It is noteworthy that, as late as the first quarter of the tenth century, the Pāṇḍya king Rājasimha II is said to have endowed, among others, several Jaina temples. 'It is clear from such facts that Jainism was not overwhelmed so completely as Buddhism by the rising tide of Śaivism and Vaisnavism in the land'⁶

The paramount influence of Śaivism in the Tamil country is also attested by the temple architecture of the time, as in the case of the Deccan.

As stated above, the early Cola king Koccenganān is said to have built many Śiva temples, while the Tevāiam saints celebrate a very large number of them in their hymns¹. But, so far as existing examples are concerned, South Indian architecture may be said to begin with the Pallavas, or more precisely, with the reign of Mahendravarman I in the first quarter of the seventh century A.D. The shrines, before his time, appear to have been built of perishable materials, but he introduced the art of excavating temples in the natural rock in the Tamil country. Almost the first cave temple, caused to be built by King Curious-minded, without bricks, without timber and without mortar, is the one at Mādagappattu in the South Arcot district, and it was dedicated to Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva². Most of the remaining caves, with one exception, were excavated for the worship of Śiva under the name of the linga, and they are found in the North Arcot Chingleput, and South Arcot districts of the Madras Presidency. The name Mahendravarmā occurs in inscriptions on the caves at Trichinopoly, Pallāvaram, Mahendravādī and Vallam, while one or other of his virūdas is mentioned in those on the caves at Dalavānūr and Śiyamangalam³. Mahendravarman's comic play Īttavilāsaprahasana is mentioned in a mutilated inscription on one of the caves at Māmandūr⁴ in the North Arcot district.

One of the inscriptions on the upper cave cut in the rock at Trichinopoly contains a verse, which has been taken to refer to Mahendravarman's former hostility to the Śaiva religion. The verse in question seems to express the hope that, while king Gunabhara (one of the virūdas of Mahendravarman I) is a worshipper of the linga emblem, the linga enshrined in the temple will proclaim the fact that he has desisted from 'hostile action', that is, his former persecution of the Śaiva faith⁵.

Mahendravarman's conversion gave a new impetus to Śaivism in the Tamil land. Only one of his caves, that at Mahendravādī, is dedicated to Viṣṇu. The rock-cut temple at Singavaram in the South Arcot district contains a very large image of Viṣṇu sleeping on the serpent Ananta, and is thought to belong to the epoch of Mahendravarman on architectural grounds. Of the three caves at Vallam (near Chingleput) two are dedicated to Śiva, one of which contains an inscription of Mahendravarman. The third cave is dedicated to Viṣṇu⁶. Reference may be made in this connection to the great rock-cut temple at Undavalli in the Guntur district, situated on the south bank of the Kishnā opposite to Bezwada 'The temple consists of a ground floor and three upper storeys hewn out of the natural rock. It has a frontage of about 90 feet in length and rises to a height of 50 feet from the ground level' The ground floor and especially the third or top storey are unfinished. The temple may be said in fact to be four-storeyed, but its different storeys are supposed to represent 'three temples of the Mahendra period excavated one above the other in the same rock' The principal image in the temple is a huge decayed image of Visnu lying on the serpent Ananta found in the second storey. 'A similar figure exists in the shrine attached to the big Śiva temple at Mahābalapuram known as the Shore temple, and it also occurs in a large bas-relief panel in a Śiva temple close to the Lighthouse at the same place' The colossal image of Anantasayana and certain Vaisnava sculptures have led to the belief that the rock-cut temple at Undavalli was originally dedicated to Visnu. But, as we have seen, it is not rare to find an image of Visnu, particularly in the form of Anantasayana, located in a Śiva temple. 'The style of the doorkeepers, panels and niches containing Śaiva figures, and the group of rockcut miniature Śiva temples containing lingas on the hill close by all indicate that Undavalli was a stronghold of the linga cult in the seventh century in spite of the presence of Vaisnava figures in the big temple' The origin of the temples at Undavalli and Bezwada is obscure; and 'there is no actual proof that they are the works of the Pallavas, but their architectural style seems to denote that they were excavated by the latter and that they represent their earliest attempts in this direction before the Pallavas were driven south by the Chālukyas and executed similar but better works in the Tamil Country'¹

There is an ancient Pallava cave-temple known as the Orukal Mandapa on the east side of the Vedagiriśvara hill bordering the town of Tirukkalukkunram not far from Chingleput. The temple was dedicated to Śiva as the shrine contains a large cylindrical granite linga. 'The style of its architecture clearly denotes that it was excavated in the reign of Mahendra' The Vedagiriśvara temple on the summit of the hill is likewise an ancient structure, but later than the Orukal Mandapa. Carved on the back wall of the main shrine of this temple is the Somaskanda panel representing Śiva and Pārvatī in the centre with the child Skanda seated between them. It may be noted that the Somaskanda panel is not found in any

- 1 Longhurst Pallava Architecture, Part I, pp 5, 22, 27, 29. Jouveau-Dubreuil first pointed out that the Undavalli caves closely resemble those of Mahendrarvarman, but he thought that they were the work of the Visnukundins who seem to have reigned on the banks of the Godavari and the Kishnā towards the end of the sixth century A D, before that country was conquered by the Chālukyas. Further, as the caves of Trichinopoly and Pallāvaram contain certain surnames of Mahendrarvarman, which are all of Telugu origin, Jouveau-Dubreuil supposed that Mahendrarvarman I reigned over the Telugu country and imported into the Tamil country the art that existed on the banks of the Kishnā. The Pallavas, pp 32, 33. Longhurst assumes, on purely architectural grounds, that the Bezwada and Undavalli cave temples are Pallava monuments of the early part of the seventh century.

shrine of the temples of the Mahendra period. It appears in the reign of Narasimhavarman I, e. g. on the back wall of the shrine cell in the Dharmarāja Ratha, and occurs in all the Pallava temples of the Rājasimha period.

Mahendriavarman I was succeeded by Narasimhavarman I in the second quarter of the seventh century A. D. He was the founder of the sea-coast town of Māmallapuram, now the village of Mahābalipuram, on a strip of sand, about 40 miles south of Madras. All his monuments as well as those of his grandson Paramesvaravarman I (about 655-690 A. D.) are mainly found at this place, and consist of cave-temples and the so-called rathas. The cave-temples are rock-cut excavations of the same style as those of the Mahendra period, but there is a distinct improvement in design and workmanship. The clumsy pillars with cubical capitals of the Mahendra period are replaced by elegant pillars with bulbous capitals, and the interiors are 'often decorated with sculptural figures in high relief of great beauty and executed with remarkable skill'. The rathas are monolithic free-standing temples, delicately carved, and look like rock-cut models of structural temples.¹ 'A few were dedicated to Vishnu, but most of them were devoted to the worship of Śiva and his consort Pārvatī, the latter sometimes in the form of Durgā'. In a few cases, a combined worship of Śiva and Viṣṇu seems to have occurred in the same temple.'

The most remarkable monument at Mahābalipuram is the so-called Dharmarāja Ratha, 'a lofty pyramidal-roofed temple with three storeys of cell-terraces above the ground floor, rising to a small octagonal dome'. The ground floor consists of a hall, about 28 feet square, with a projecting portico facing the west. As an example of marvellous stone-cutting and carving, it is 'quite the most wonderful monument in Southern India. It is also very interesting as the prototype of the lofty structural pyramidal temples of later times'.

It may be definitely stated that the Dharmarāja Ratha and the Ganeśa Temple², 'quite the most finished and ornate' of all the rathas,

1 For example, the so-called Arjuna's Ratha (these local names have no historical significance) represents 'a stone model of a small two-storeyed building crowned with an octagonal bell-shaped dome mainly of timber construction'. The Sahadeva's Ratha consists of a ground floor and two upper storeys, with a waggon-headed roof. All three floors are apsidal-ended like Buddhist cātyas or churches. 'Like all the other so-called rathas, it is obviously a stone model of a building mainly of wooden construction'. The Bhīma's Ratha is waggon-roofed. 'It is a stone model of a large barn-like building mainly of timber construction. On plan it measures 42 feet in length, 25 feet in width and is about 25 feet high'. The roof of this so-called Bhīma's Ratha 'would seem to be the prototype of the ordinary waggon roof of all the great gopurams or gateways of the South Indian temples'. The ratha known as the Ganeśa temple is an oblong monolithic edifice 'with two upper storeys and a waggon-roof, having two gable end facades with horseshoe bargeboards like Bhīma's Ratha which it closely resembles, although much smaller, being only 20 feet in length from north to south, 11½ feet in width, and 28 feet in height'. See Longhurst Pallava Architecture, Part II.

2 So called, because an image of Ganeśa was installed in the temple by the villagers in recent times.

and the cave-temples known as the Dharmarāja Mandapa and the Rāmānuja Mandapa were originally dedicated to Śiva. The name atyanta-kāma-pallavesvara-grha, the Śiva temple of Atyantakāma Pallava', is inscribed on the east and west sides of the third storey of the Dharmarāja Ratha, and occurs also in a duplicate inscription on the Ganeśa temple and the Dharmarāja Mandapa. Further, a verse condemning those who do not worship Śiva occurs in the same inscription, and is found also inscribed on the Rāmānuja Mandapa¹. As regards atyanta-kāma, it seems to have been a bruda of both Narasimhavaiṣṇava I and Paramesvaravaiṣṇava I. The name Śrī-Narasimha and the epithet atyanta-kāma occur, the former twice, in a string of inscription (Nos 1-16) engraved in an archaic alphabet on the Dharmarāja Ratha, showing that it was founded by Narasimhavaiṣṇava I. The name Paramesvara and the title Atyantakāma occur in the duplicate inscription on the Ganesa temple and the Dharmarāja Mandapa, and it is probable that the reference is to Paramesvaravaiṣṇava I². As both these temples are called atyanta-kāma-pallavesvara-grha, the title Atyantakāma is here thought to refer to Paramesvaravaiṣṇava I. But the name atyanta-kāma-pallavesvara-grha is inscribed also on the east side of the third storey of the Dharmarāja Ratha (Inscription No 17), not in the archaic alphabet of Inscriptions 1-16, but in the fluid alphabet used in the inscriptions on the Dharmarāja Mandapa and the Ganeśa temple. It is therefore supposed that the Dharmarāja Ratha was built by Narasimhavaiṣṇava I, but it was consecrated by Paramesvaravaiṣṇava I, surnamed Atyantakāma, who gave it the name of Atyantakāmapallaveśvara³.

Most of the other temples at Mahābalipuram were devoted to the worship of Śiva. The rock-cut temple near the Duigā shrine is a large five celled Śaiva temple similar, on plan and in dimensions, to the temple of Mahendravaiṣṇava at Pallavaiṣṇava⁴. The central shrine of the Trimūrti temple was dedicated to Śiva, and 'contains a bas-relief carved on the back wall representing a four-armed standing image of Śiva'. The so-called Aijuna's Ratha was also dedicated to Śiva, and contained a head of the deity surmounted by the trident. It is believed that 'these trident heads were set up in the shrine cells in place of the usual Śiva lingas'. The custom appears to have been peculiar to the Pallavas as such images do not seem to have been discovered elsewhere'. The Mahisāsura Mandapa is a large triple-celled Śaiva cave-temple 'a socket hole, cut in the centre of the floor of the cell, points to the fact that it had, or was designed for a Śiva linga'. A large square panel on the back wall of the shrine chamber contains a bas-relief representing the Sukhāsana group (Śiva, Pārvatī, the child Skanda and the bull Nandi).

The two cave-temples known as the Varāha Mandapa and the Vaiāha Temple appear to be the only ancient Vaisnava shrines at Mahābalipuram. Carved in bas-relief in four large panels on the walls of the former are remarkable sculptures representing the Vaiāha Avatāra, the Vāmana Avatāra, Laksmī and Durgā. The Varāha Temple contains a large bas-relief, 8 feet high, of the Boar Incarnation, carved on the back wall of the shrine chamber. Vaisnavism seems to have ousted the Śaiva faith from its dominant position at Māmallapuram at a much later date when the lingas were cast out of the shrines, and some of the Śiva temples damaged and subjected to what has been called Vaisnava vandalism¹. But there is no doubt that during the Pallava period Māmallapuram was a stronghold of Śaiva worship.

There must have been Śaiva temples at other places besides Māmallapuram during the reigns of Narasimhavarman I and Paramesvaravarman I. The Kūram plates issued by the latter, sometime after his victory over the Chālukya Vikramāditya I in 674 A. D., record a grant to the Śiva temple of Vidyāvinīta Pallaveśvara, which has been identified with the dilapidated Śiva temple at Kūram, a village near Conjeevaram². At Melacheri in the South Arcot district there is a cave-temple dedicated to Śiva, which contains an inscription recording the fact that it was built by the emperor Candraditya. It has been surmised by Jouveau-Dubreuil on paleographic grounds that Candraditya was a name of Narasimhavarman I or Paramesvaravarman I³.

The Pallava cave-temples⁴ are small in comparison with the stupendous excavations at Ellora, and appear to have gone out of vogue by the end of the seventh century. Paramesvaravarman I was succeeded by his son Narasimhavarman II, or Rājasimha, who distinguished himself by his piety and devotion to Śiva. About the first decade of the eighth century A. D., he built the central shrine of the Kailāsanātha temple at Conjeevaram, the Shore Temple at Mahābalipuram, and the old Śiva temple at Panamalai in the South Arcot district⁵. The temples of Rājasimha possess fluted black stone lingas,

1 Longhurst (op cit.), Part II, pp 5, 34, 37. 'The comparatively ruined and desecrated state of the Śaiva shrines, and the dispersion, overthrow and destruction of lingas, together with the unmolested state of the Vaisnava temples and symbols, suggest strongly the violent overthrow of the Śaiva by the Vaisnava faith' at Māmallapuram. The interior of the so called Rāmānuja Mandapa was completely wrecked, and one of the pillars of the Mahīśāsura Mandapa was cut out and removed to the Varāha Temple, presumably, to be used in the construction of the modern mandapa erected in front of the old rockcut shrine. 'The few Tamil inscriptions dating from 1073 to 1235 A. D. that have been found at Māmallapuram, indicate that the Vaisnava sect was dominant during that period, and its followers seem to have remained in the ascendant down to the present day. They still occupy the Varāha Temple and the large modern-looking Sthalasayana Temple in the village and keep up the services of their sect therein.'

2 Jouveau-Dubreuil The Pallavas, p 45.

3 Ibid Pallava Antiquities, Vol I, p 66.

4 One of the largest, the so called Mahīśāsura Mandapa, is '32 feet long from north to south, 15 feet wide and 12½ feet high'.

and on the back wall of the shrine is carved the Somaskanda panel representing Śiva and Pārvatī, seated, with the child Skanda on the latter's knee. The temple of Anāvatesvara at Conjeeveiram is also dedicated to Śiva, and bears all the characteristics of the style of Rājasimha, but it is not definitively known whether it was built in his reign¹

The Shore Temple is built on the shore within a few feet of the sea at Mahābalipuram. From an architectural point of view, it appears to be earlier than the central shrine of the Kailāsanātha temple, as the latter seems to be mainly a development of the former. The Shore Temple faces the sea on the east side, and at the back facing the west is another Śiva temple, smaller in size, but built in the same style as the main building. 'The stepped tower over the central shrine is divided into three main storeys, like Dharmarāja's ratha, and is crowned with the usual umbrella-shaped ornament surmounted by a lofty black stone Kalāsam or urn-finial.'

The central shrine of the Kailāsanātha temple at Conjeeveram is called Rājasimhesvara in old inscriptions, as it was built by Rājasimha, while his son Mahendravarman III seems to have completed the edifice. Mahendravarman III built also a smaller Śiva temple with a waggon-headed roof, now called Nāradeśvara, in front of the Kailāsanātha Temple, and named it Mahendresvara, or Mahendravarmanesvara, after himself². At a distance of 26 feet to the east, in front of the central shrine of the Kailāsanātha or Rājasimhesvara temple, is an old Mandapa or pillared hall which seems to have been built about the same time as the temple. It is now connected with the latter 'by an unsightly modern apartment with an entrance on the south side'. 'The pyramidal tower over the central shrine is divided into three main storeys rising to a total height of about 50 feet and is crowned with the usual umbrella ornament surmounted by an urn-finial.'

The provision of procession paths and big enclosures around the temples of the Rājasimha period is an entirely new feature, as in the earlier Pallava temples it was not customary to surround the shrine with a circumambulatory passage or procession path, nor was any attempt made to provide walled enclosures or temple-yards around the shrines prior to this period. 'It would appear that, originally, the procession path, or passage around the shrine was open to the sky as in the Shore Temple. In the Panamalai and Conjeeveram temples, we find the passage closed with a flat roof and the interior in total darkness.' 'The style of the temples of the earlier period shows that the Hinduism of those early days was a simple, straight-forward form of worship conducted openly, and free from that secrecy and mysticism which forms such a striking feature of that religion in later times, necessitating the provision of secret passages around the shrine, gloomy interiors and high-walled enclosures, features quite unknown in the earlier examples.' The elaboration of structural details and appendages shows that the cults of the temples and Śaiva ritual in particular tended to become more and more elaborate and complex, say from the eighth century onwards.

The temple of Kailāsanātha at Conjeeveeram is of considerable historical importance, as it serves as one of the connecting links between the architecture of Southern India and that of the Deccan. The Chālukya Vikramāditya II (733-746 A.D.), who invaded the Pallava dominions (Tundāka-viśaya or Tondai-mandalam), defeated the Pallava king Nandivarman and entered Kāñci or Conjeeveeram. But he spared the Pallava capital and seems to have respected and admired its monuments, the Rājasimheśvara or the Kailāsanātha temple in particular. It is stated in the Vakkaleri grant that he acquired great religious merit by restoring to the stone temple of Rājasimheśvara, caused to be built by Nārasimha-pota-varman, and to other temples, the gold, which had probably been confiscated by his subordinates without his permission¹. That Vikramāditya II visited the Kailāsnātha temple seems to be proved by a Kanarese inscription engraved on a pillar of the ancient Mandapa in front of the central shrine, which begins with the name of "Vikramāditya Satyāsaya Śū-Prthivī-vallabha", and mentions the temple of Rājasimheśvara². As mentioned above, the great temple of Virūpākṣa at Pattadakal was built by the queen consort of Vikramāditya II in commemoration of his conquest of Kāñci, and the superior technique of that temple, as compared with the shrine of Vijayēśvara built by his predecessor Vijayāditya, has been explained by supposing that Vikramāditya II must have brought with him skilled artisans from the southern capital. That this is not a mere guess is shown by an inscription on the eastern gateway of Virūpākṣa, which speaks of the builder of the Lokēśvara (Virūpākṣa) temple as 'the most eminent sūtradhārī of the southern country'. Further, "high up on the front or east face of the temple of Pāpanātha at Pattadakal is an inscription in praise of a certain Chattara-Revadi-Ovajja who is said to have 'made the southern country', i.e. was the builder of the temples of the southern country. He belonged to the same guild, the Saivasiddhi-ācāryas, as the builder of Virūpākṣa in the last inscription". It is therefore probable that the old temple of Vijayēśvara at Pattadakal was constructed by local builders, and that of Virūpākṣa by more capable architects from the Pallava capital³. It may be assumed that Vikramāditya's conquest of Kāñci indirectly gave a stimulus to the building art and the Saiva faith in the Deccan, and the temples of Conjeeveeram and the shrine of Rājasimheśvara in particular seem to have been the main source of inspiration.

Narasimhavarman II or Rājasimha was succeeded by Mahendrarvarman III, and the latter by Paramēśvaravarman II. Paramēśvaravarman II built an important Viṣṇu temple, that of Vaikuntha Perumāḷ at Conjeeveiam, of which we shall speak later. The Śiva temple of Virattaneśvara at Tiruvādi in the South Arcot district contains an inscription belonging to the reign of Parameśvara-Pottaiyai, and might perhaps be attributed to Parameśvaravarman II.¹

There was a change in the line of succession after Parameśvaravarman II, and Nandivarman Pallavamalla came to the throne about 720 A.D. The Pallavas reigned for a further period of more than a century and a half, and continued the tradition of building temples in honour of Śiva. These shrines are smaller in size, of which the best examples are the temples of Muktesvara and Matangeśvara at Conjeevearam. The first may be assigned to about the middle of the eighth century and the second to its end.² The temple of Kailāsanātha at Ālambākkam founded by Dantivarman, who succeeded Nandivarman Pallavamalla towards the end of the eighth century A.D., was probably rebuilt during the Cola period. To the later Pallava period also belong the temple of Parasurāmeśvara at Gudmāllam near Renigunta and that of Vādāmaliśvara at Oragadam near Chingleput. It is said that Śiva temples with the name Parasurāmeśvara are not rare in the South, and they are believed to owe their existence to Paraśurāma. The temple at Oragadam is apsidal-ended, and modelled on the style of the rock-cut temple known as Sahadeva's Ratha at Mahābalipuram. 'Apsidal-ended temples of this type are not uncommon in Southern India, and as a rule are dedicated to Śiva. Perhaps in adopting this style of building from the Buddhists, the Brāhmanas saw in its apsidal-ended plan the sacred form of the linga or phallic emblem of Śiva, and thus considered it an appropriate design for Śaivite temples.'

One of the latest Pallava temples dedicated to Śiva is that of Virattaneśvara at Tiruttani, which belongs to the reign of Aparājita, the last of the Pallavas, and was therefore built in the last quarter of the ninth century. 'It is square on plan with a small porch or hall facing the east giving access to a shrine chamber 6 feet square.' 'The tower or Vimāna over the shrine chamber is designed like a small model of a Buddhist caitya and bears a striking resemblance to Sahadeva's Ratha.'

That Śaivism was the prevailing religion during the Pallava period is shown by the Pallava monuments, most of which are dedicated to Śiva. It has been said of the Pallava capital that 'in the south the honour belongs to one city only and that is Kāñcī'. It seems that this position was attained by Kāñcī under the orthodox rule of the Pallavas and mainly by the religion of Śaivism which they propagated and favoured together with the greatness of the Śaiva saints who flourished there. Buddhism and Jainism both found followers in the Pallavā empire, but the religion of the ruling family and the people generally was Śaivism. They built a few Viṣṇu temples, but Śiva was their family deity, and Kāñcī is still the greatest stronghold of Śaivism in the south, and the most devout Śaiva poets and saints belong to that city¹ The simultaneous existence of Vaisnavism cannot indeed be ruled out, but it seems to have played a subsidiary rôle during the Pallava period and probably long after The earliest of the Alvārs were associated with Kāñcī, but it is not easy to assign dates or the extent of their influence on contemporary society Tirumangai, the last of the Alvārs, has been assigned to the eighth century, and he was probably a contemporary of Nandivairaman Pallavamalla² Among the great Pallavas, Paramēśvaravairaman II appears to have been a devout Vaisnava, and the Vaikuntha Perumāl temple built by him at Kāñcī is one of the few large Pallava temples dedicated to Viṣṇu³ The Kesava Perumāl temple at Kūṭam near Conjeevaram is another Pallava shrine dedicated to Viṣṇu It contains an inscription of the reign of Dantivairaman, and there is no doubt that the temple belongs to the latter half of the eighth century⁴ Similar traces of Vaisnavism are found in the Pāṇḍya country where, as we have seen, some of the early triumphs of Śaivism had been achieved In 770 A D Mārangāṇi or Madhurakavi, a minister of the Pāṇḍya king Varaguna Nedunjadayan built a stone temple for Viṣṇu in the Anamalai hill near Madura, and gave a village to some Brahmins apparently on the occasion of the installation of the image of Nārasimha in the temple The king, too, built a large temple for Viṣṇu, but though he is called parama-vaisnavan in inscriptions, he was liberal in his benefactions to Śaiva temples⁵

The Pallavas were supplanted by the Colas about the end of the ninth century A D when Āditya I defeated Aparājita, the last independent king of the Pallava dynasty The Colas were ardent Śaivas, and their rule prolonged the domination of the Śaiva faith They were also great builders of temples, and from an architectural point of view, the later Pallava style merges into the early Cola According to the Anbil plates, Āditya I (circa 871-907 A D) built on both banks of the Kāvērī tall stone temples in honour of Śiva After his death, a Śiva temple called by the names Ādityeśvara and Kodandarāmeśvara was founded in his memory by his son and successor Parāntaka I (907-953 A D) As already mentioned,

3 Like the Kailāsanātha temple, the pyramidal tower consists of a central shrine on the ground floor and three upper storeys The one on the ground floor contains a large four armed image of Viṣṇu in a sitting posture The shrine of the first floor contains a fairly large image of Viṣṇu in the form of Anantasayana The cell on the second floor contains a smaller image of Viṣṇu The third story of the tower is hollow The Anantasayana form of Viṣṇu seems to have been popular in the South Between the Shore Temple and the small attendant Śiva temple at Mahābalipuram, 'is a third shrine containing a large decayed stone image of Viṣṇu in a recumbent position and representing that deity in the form of Anantasayana' It is an oblong cell built up against the back wall of the smaller Śiva temple, and appears to be a later addition Longhurst (op cit), pp 3, 16

the custom of founding such memorial temples dedicated to Śiva was also prevalent in the Deccan in the tenth century. Parāntaka I is known to have covered with gold the Śiva temple at Cidambaram. 'In fact Parāntaka's reign was a great epoch in the history of South Indian temple architecture, and the work of temple-building begun by Āditya was continued vigorously during the best part of his reign',¹

South Indian Śaivism may be said to have reached its apogee during the reign of Rājaraṣa I (985-1014 A. D.). The great literary reorganisation of Tamil Śaivism took place in his time. The hymns and devotional poems of the Śaiva saints were collected and arranged in eleven sections, or Tirumurai, by Nambi Āṇḍāi Nambi, a Brahmin priest of Tirunārayur in the Tanjore district, under the patronage of Rājaraṣa Abhaya Kulasekhara Cola, identified with Rājaraṣa I.² The encouragement of Nambi Āṇḍāi Nambi in his great undertaking was not the only service rendered by Rājaraṣa I to the cause of Śaivism. It was he who built the celebrated Śiva temple at Tanjore, the Rājaraṣeśvara, perhaps the most magnificent creation of the South Indian building art, with the vimāna, or tower, rising 'over the sanctum to a height of nearly 200 feet on a square base of about a hundred feet'. Rājaraṣa who invaded and conquered Ceylon seems to have built a stone temple to Śiva at Polonnaruwa, the new capital of the island, founded after the destruction of the ancient capital Anurādhapura by the invading armies. It is a small but beautiful structure, and one of 'the few Hindu monuments in Ceylon, which are still in a good state of preservation'. The Śiva temple at Dādapuram in the South Arcot district bears an inscription of Rājaraṣa, and is another well-preserved example of the early Cola style of the tenth century A. D.³ It may also be noted that an inscription of the twenty-fourth year of the reign of Rājaraṣa I records a sale of land, tax-free, for the pavitraṛohana ceremony in honour of Mahādeva of the Candiamauliśvara temple by certain residents of Merpāḍi alias Rājāśayapuram.⁴ Pavitrārohana or Pavitrāropana is an important Śaiva rite described in detail in Īśānasvagrūdeva-paddhati (Kṛiyūpāda, chap. XXI).

Rājaraṣa I was succeeded by his son Rājendra I who reigned till 1044 A. D. The latter is said to have imported Śaivas from the banks of the Ganges and settled them in Kāñcīpura and in the Cola country. The great Śiva temple built by him in his new capital Gangaikondacolapuram still stands amidst the ruins of the city in the Trichinopoly district. The emphasis on vimānas of stupendous height is the outstanding feature of the early Cola style at Tanjore and Gangaikonda-colapuram.

It is not necessary for our purpose to pursue further the course of Śaivism in South India. The finishing touch to the devotional literature of Tamil Śaivism may be said to have been given by Śekkilāi in the twelfth century, by recounting the lives of the Śaiva saints in his Periyapurāṇam, based on the earlier work of Nambī Andāi Nambī. The organisation of Vaiṣṇavism initiated by Nāthamuni in the tenth century and continued by Yāmūnācārya was completed about this time by Rāmānuja, who seems to have been an elder contemporary of Śekkilār. The activity of the Vaiṣṇava Acāryas thus falls within the period of the Śaivite Colas. Rājaraṇja the Great was liberal in his outlook, and though a devout Śaiva, built Viṣṇu temples in Mysore and richly endowed others¹. But it is significant that Rāmānuja and his followers were persecuted by a Cola king usually supposed to be Kulottunga I who commenced his reign in 1070 A. D. There are other instances of the Cola persecution of the Viṣṇu cult, and, in any case, the initial triumph of Rāmānuja was achieved not in the Cola country, but in Mysore under Bittideva or Viṣṇuvaidhana Hoysala who reigned in the first half of the twelfth century.

APPENDIX IV

THE KĀLĀMUKHA SECT

In Chapter XIII, p. 350, we have referred to the important Kālamukha sect and its influence in the Mysore country in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. The Kālamukhas were influential also in the Cola country from about the tenth century A. D., and the relevant evidence is summarized by Prof. Nilakanta Sastri in his Colas, Vol. II (part I), p. 494. A matha of the Kālamukhas existed at Melpādi (North Arcot), where Kṛṣṇa III established his camp during his invasion of the Cola kingdom, as recorded in Somadeva's Yasastilaka. Kālamukha teachers bearing the names Śailarāsi and Jñānarāsi are mentioned in connection with endowments in the temple of Tiruvānaikkoyil (Chingleput) in the years 1127, 1205 and 1231. A Kālamukha teacher sold some land to the temple at Koyil Tevarāyanpettai (Tanjore district) in 1123 A. D.

As we have seen, the Kālamukhas of the Mysore region were Pāśupatas, and are often described as exponents of the Lākula creed, and sometimes a teacher is compared to Lakuliśvara, the founder of the system, or styled as Lakuliśvara-Pandita. Similar evidence is furnished by the Cola inscriptions. The head of the matha of the Kālamukhas at Melpādi was, for instance, called Lakuliśvara-Pandita. Some of these Kālamukha teachers are called also mahāvratin, 'possessed of the great vow'. An inscription from Jambai (South Arcot) of the reign of the Cola king Virarājendra (1063-69 A. D.) mentions a Mahāvratin Lakuliśvara-Pandita in connection with the local temple. An inscription of the twentieth year of the reign of Kṛṣṇa III, i. e. about 959 A. D., describes how a certain man of a noble family, a devoted friend of the Cola prince Rājāditya, turned ascetic after the death of the latter on the battlefield (see p 2), and became a mahāvratin, under the name of Caturānana Pandita, and the head of the matha at Tuvorriyū (Chingleput district). It is difficult to explain why the Kālāmukha ascetics are styled here as mahāvratin, which is the usual name for Kāpālikas (see p 358). It is true that the Kālāmukhas are sometimes described as a sect very much akin to the Kāpālikas who were notorious for their evil practices. But the Kālāmukhas of the Mysore and Cola inscriptions were followers of the Pāsupata system, and could hardly have been affiliated to the degenerate Kālāmukha sect mentioned by Yāmuna Muni and Rāmānuja. It is, of course, not impossible that among the members of the Kālāmukha Pāsupata sect there were a few who might have adopted the Kāpālika way of life and figured as the Kālāmukhas stigmatized by the Vaiṣṇava teachers.

The Kālāmukha teachers described in the Cola inscriptions as Mahāvratins might be same as the Mahāpāsupatas mentioned by Udayana in his Nyāya-kusumāñjali, which was composed in north India towards the end of the tenth century, about the time when the Kālāmukha Pāsupatas were becoming prominent in the south. We have noted (p 241) that the commentators on Nyāya-kusumāñjali explain Mahāpāsupatas as those Pāsupatas who observe mahāvratā or the great vow. A certain amount of doctrinal affinity seems to have existed as between the Pāsupatas and the Kāpālikas (see p 241), but it seems certain that mahāvratā did not exclusively mean the Kāpālika cult, and the term mahāvratin was applied also to the Kālāmukha Pāsupata teachers of the south.

We learn from Sastri Colas (op cit) that a chieftain named Vikramakesari presented a big matha to a Kālāmukha teacher named Mallikārjuna who was his guru, and gave him also eleven villages attached to the matha for the maintenance of fifty Asita-vaktra, that is, Kālāmukha ascetics. Vikramakesari belonged to Kodumbālūr (Pudukkottah) and was an ally of the Cola king Parāntaka II who ruled after 953 A. D. On p 359 we have connected Mallikārjuna with the disreputable Kālāmukha sect, but in the light of the evidence furnished by the Cola inscriptions, it will be more appropriate to suppose that he was one of the Kālāmukha Pāsupata teachers who figure so prominently in the religious life of the south from about the tenth century onwards. These teachers, respected and patronized by kings, and in charge of monastic establishments, could hardly be supposed to have belonged to a sect akin to the Kāpālikas merely on account of the similarity of names.

Kāmpilya, Book VII, section 32 (पञ्चालदेशेषु त्रिदशनिवेशानुक्रोशस्य कम्पिल्ये) Identified with Kampil in Farrukhabad District, U P The city of Kākandī, described as a great commercial centre (सकलजगद्वहारावनारविषया काकन्याम् Ibid), seems to have been in the neighbourhood of Kāmpilya, as the miser Sāgaradatta goes from the latter city to Kākandī on hearing of the death of his nephew, and returns not long after Kākandī is mentioned also in Book VII, section 24 It was the birth place of the Jaina Tirthamkara Puspadanta Somadeva says श्रीमत्पुष्पदन्तभद्रन्तावनारावतीर्णत्रिदिव पतिसपादितोद्यवेन्द्रिरामन्या काकन्या पुरि

Kanakagiri, Book III, p 566 A mountain near Ujjayinī Yasodhara, the king of Ujjayinī, is described as the lord of Kanakagiri Comm says that Kanakagiri is the name of a city on the Suvarnagiri mountain, four Krosas from Ujjayinī (सुवर्णगिरिनामपर्वतोपरि वसति यत् नगरं तत् कनकगिरिरित्युच्यते । उज्जयिन्या समीपे गव्यूतिद्वयं गत्वा कनकगिरि प्राप्यते ।)

Kankāhī, Book V A village near Ujjayinī The inhabitants of the village manufactured woolen shawls or carpets and leather saddles Somadeva says उज्जयिनी निकषा तमनाजिनजेणाजीवनोटजाकुले कङ्काहिनामके ग्रामधामके Comm says तमतम् ऊर्गमियमास्तरणम्, अजिनजेण चर्मपल्याणम्

Karahāta, Book V Karhād on the confluence of the Krishnā and the Koinā in Sātārā District, Bombay Province. Somadeva describes Karahāta as a prosperous country and gives an interesting picture of a large dairy farm of the locality He refers also to the tall gold-crested edifices of Karahāta 'अपि च यत्र, मोत्सेयसौवर्षिखिराश्रयशतकुम्भशुम्भप्रमाप्रशु नभ प्रविभाव्य भूय ।'

Karnāta 1 185 (कर्णाटयुवतिसुरतावनस) and कर्णाटीना कुचकलशविलासपङ्खव Book I Roughly the country between the Godāvarī and the Kāverī, bordering on the Arabian Sea in the West, and extending approximately to 78° longitude in the East Sources of

Karnāṭaka History, Vol I, p VII Under 1 211 (कर्णाटयुवतिकैवविदग्ध) comm explains Karnāta as comprising Vidara and other places कर्णाटयुवतीना विदरादिर्नीणाम् Vidara is modern Bidar (District and Town) in Hyderabad State Comm on Book I identifies Karnāta with Vanavāsa (or Vanavāsī) कर्णाटीना वनवासदेवयोषिनाम्

Kaunga, Book III कोङ्गेपु कुङ्ग etc, p 431 Same as Kongude-a, 'the western part of Maisur as far as Nandidiug, together with Coimbatore and Salem' Rapson Indian Coins, p 36

Kaus'āmbī, Book III (कौशांबीनिनिम्बिनीनिम्बाधर-मण्डन) Identified with Kosam on the Jumna, about 30 miles west of Allahabad Kausāmbī was the capital of the Vatsa country Comm says कौशांबी नाम नगरं वत्सदेशे गोपाचलात् गव्यूतिचतुश्चत्वारिदशनि वनने If Gavyūti, as a measure of distance, is taken to mean two Krosas or four miles, Kausāmbī, according to the commentary, is about 176 miles from Gopācala or Gwahor Kausāmbī is mentioned also in Book VII, section 26 In an early Buddhist text (the Mahā Sudassana-Suttanta of the Dīghanikāya) Kosambi is mentioned as one of the great cities, the others being Campā, Rājagaha, Benares etc

Kīra 3 249 (काश्मीरै कीरनाथ) Kashmir Comm. says कीरनाथ शुक्रदेवस्वामी काश्मीरदेशाधिप

Krathakais'ika, Book III कथकेशिकेषु काम etc, p 431 and कथकेशिककुरातु, p 567 Comm explains the term as Virātade-a, corresponding roughly to the present territory of Jaipur and Alwar States Kālidāsa identifies Krathakaisika with Vidarbha (Berar and the adjoining territory) in Raghuramsa 5 60, 61

Kuntala 1 211 (कुन्तलकान्तालकमङ्गलिनर) 'In the inscriptions of the later Kadambas, the progenitor of the Kadamba family (sometimes called Mayūravarma, but in some cases Mukkana or Trilocana Kadamba) is represented as the ruler of the Kuntala country which is described as the land round the capital city of Vanavāsi in the North Kanara District' The territories of the Kadambas of Vanavāsi comprised the North Kanara District and parts of Mysore, Belgaum and Dharwar. Somadeva seems to have this area in his mind. See Sarkar in IHQ, Vol XXII, p 233. Kuntala seems, however, to refer to a wider area. "The following verse which occurs in the Nilgund plate describes the Later Cālukya emperor Jayasimha II alias Mallikāmoda as ruling over the Kuntala country where flows the famous river Kṛṣṇavarnā (i.e. the Kṛṣṇā which gets this name after its confluence with the Venā near Manuli, 3 miles east of Sātārā) विस्वयत्कृष्णवणे तेलसंहोपलब्धमरुत्ते। कुन्तलविविधे निररा विराजते महिमानोद् ॥" The Rāstrakūṭas and the Later Cālukyas are described in contemporary records and Sanskrit works as rulers of Kuntala. The capital of the Rāstrakūṭas was Mānyakheta, modern Malkhed in the Gulbarga District of Hyderabad State, while that of the Later Cālukyas was Kalyāna, about 50 miles almost due north of Malkhed, near Bidar in the Bidar District in the same State. "Malkhed is about 250 miles, as the crow flies, north by east of Banavāsi and more than 50 miles north of the Kṛṣṇā." The Udayasundarikāthā says that Pratisthāna, modern Paithan on the Godavari, was the capital of the Kuntala country. Kuntala thus did not comprise only the North Kanara District of Bombay Province and parts of Mysore, Belgaum and Dharwar Districts, but extended much further to the north so as to include what we now call the Southern Maratha country. See Mirashi in IHQ, Vol XXII, p 310.

Kurujāngala 1 211 (कुरुजाङ्गललनाकुचतनुत्र) A portion of the Kuru country, which contained the city of Hastināpura, called by Somadeva Hastināgapura or Hastināpura in Book VI, section 20. Jāngaladesa and Hastināgapura are mentioned also in Book VII, section 28.

Kuśāgrapura in Magadha, Book VI, section 6

(मगधदेशेषु कुशाग्रनगरोपान्नापातिनि) Kuśāgrapura is mentioned by Yuan Chwang, being called the centre of Magadha and its old capital. "The city derived its name from the excellent fragrant reed-grass which abounded there." Watters On Yuan Chwang's Travels in India, Vol II, p 148. According to a tradition preserved in Hemacandra's Trisastīśālā-lāpuruṣacarita, Prasenajit was king of Kuśāgrapura. Because of frequent fires in Kuśāgrapura Prasenajit ordered that any one in whose house a fire occurred should be exiled from the city. As a fire subsequently occurred in the palace, Prasenajit felt bound by his own edict, left the city, and founded Rājagṛha. See Johnson in IHQ, Vol XXII, p 228. Rājagṛha, the new capital, is modern Rajgir, south of Patna, near Bihar (town). Rājagṛha, called also Pañcāśailapura, the city surrounded by the five hills, is mentioned by Somadeva in Book VI, section 13 (मगधदेशेषु राजगृहापरनामावसरे पञ्चदौलपुरे)

Kusumapura, Book IV (कुसुमपुरे चरादाकणित etc). Same as Pāṭaliputra.

Lampāka, Book III (लम्पाकपुरपुरधिकाधरमाधुर्यपश्यतो-हरे हेमने मरुति) Identified with the modern Laghman. It is the Lan-po of Yuan chuang, and supposed to represent the Lambata of Ptolemy. Watters On Yuan Chwang, Vol I, p 181.

Lāṭa 1 185 (लटीमुखाब्जसभोगहस) Comm says लटीना भृगुकच्छदेशोद्भवाना स्त्रीणाम् Bhrgukaccha, or Bhairukaccha, as it is called in Pāli, is modern Broach (District and Town) at the mouth of the Narmadā. Lāṭa corresponds roughly to Eastern Gujarat.

Madra 3 112 (प्रविश रे मद्रेश देशान्तरम्) Identified with the country about Sakala (Sialkot) in the Punjab between the Ravi and the Chenab.

Māhismatī, Book III (हिमालयमलयमगधमध्यदेश-माहिष्मतापतिप्रभृतीनामवनीपतीना बलानि and माहिष्मतीयुवतिरिति कुसुमचाप) Comm says माहिष्मती नाम नगरी यमुनपुरदिशि पत्तनम्. Supposed to be Maheshwar on the Narmadā in Indore, or

Mandhata, also on the Narmadā, in Nimar District, C P Māhismatī was the capital of the early Kalacūris (Kataccūris) who ruled over Mahārāstra between the extinction of the Andhrabhrtyas and the rise of the Cālukyas Bhandarkar Early History of the Dekhan, 3rd ed, Notes, p 251 Kṛṣṇarāja, the founder of the early Kalacūri dynasty, established himself at Māhismatī about the middle of the 6th century A D The capital was later transferred to Tripurī near Jubbulpur Cf IHQ, Vol XXI, p 84

Mathurā For references to Mathurā see Chap XVII of this book In Book VI, section 10, Uttara-Mathurā, 'Mathurā of the North', is distinguished from Dakṣiṇa-Mathurā, 'Mathurā of the South,' in Pāndyamandala, i e Madura

Mithilāpura, Book VI, section 20.

Nepāla 3 249 (नृगमदैरेष नेपालपाल)

Padmāvati, Book III (पद्मावतीपुरपरमेश्वर) Comm explains it as Ujjayinī Mentioned also in Book VII, section 26 A marginal note in ms A gives the same explanation

Padminīkheta, Book VII, section 27 Name of a city

Pallava 1 207 (पल्लव लघु केलीरसमैहि), 1 210 (पल्लवरमणीकृतविरहखेद), and पल्लवीपु नितम्बखली-खेलनकुरङ्ग Book I The Pallava country was the region of Kāñci (Conjeeveram), the ancient Tondaimandalam, ruled over by the Pallavas until they were overthrown by the Colas towards the end of the ninth century The Pallava territory was annexed by the Colas, but the memories of Pallava rule must have been still fresh when Somadeva wrote a little more than half a century later Further, Pallava chieftains continued to rule here and there under Cola suzerainty Poussin Dynasties et Histoire de l'Inde, p 271 Comm explains Pallava as Pañca-Drāmila, which is rather vague, but there is no doubt that the Drāmila or Diāvida or the Tamil country is meant In Book III Somadeva describes a Drāmila or Tamil or Dravidian Regiment (द्रामिल बलम्) Apart from the Pallavas, the Kāñci territory is mentioned in Book III (काञ्चिकामिनीकुचकलशकिसलय) Comm says काञ्चिर्नाम दक्षिणसमुद्रतटदेश

Pañcāla A king of Pañcāla (modern Rohilkhand, U P) figures prominently in Book III The Pañcālakas are mentioned in 3 112, 247

Pāndu, Book IV (पाण्डुपु मुण्डरीम्) Same as the Pāndya country The king of the Pāndyadesa is mentioned in 3 248

Pātaliputra The courtesans of Pātaliputra are incidentally referred to in Book III (पाटलिपुत्रपण्याङ्गनामुज्ज) Another Pātali-putra, located in Surāstradesa (Kathiawar), is mentioned in Book VI, section 12.

Paudanapura See under Aśmaka

Paurava, Book III (पौरवपुराश्रीरोध्रतिलक) Comm. says that Pauravapura is Ayodhyā

Rājapura, capital of the Yaudheya country, described in Book I "The Yaudheyas have been identified with the modern Johiyas of Bhāwalpur, but in ancient times their territory was more extended." Rapson Indran Coins, p 14. Rājapura may perhaps be identified with modern Rajanpur in Bahawalpur State, south of Multan See also Chap XV of this Book.

S'ankhapura, Book VI, section 8 Seems to be not far from Ayodhyā In the story in question Anantamatī is abandoned in the neighbourhood of a mountain bordering on Śankhapura, whence she is taken to Ayodhyā by a merchant who had pitched his camp near by (शङ्खपुरपर्यन्तपर्वतो-

S'ricandra 3 249 (श्रीचन्द्रश्चन्द्रकान्तैर्विविधकुलधनैर्माण्यमभूतैस्त्वा, द्रष्टुं द्वारे समास्ते) The reference is obscure Comm explains Sricandra as the lord of the Kailāsa mountain

S'rimāia 3 247 Bhīmal in Jodhpur State It is the Bhīlamāla mentioned in the Prasasti of the Jaina Prākṛit romance Kuvalayamālā composed in the eighth century S'rimāla was the original home of the Jains now inhabiting Rajputana, Western India, the Punjab and the U P See Jinavijayaji Muni in Bhāratiya Vidyā, Vol II, Parts I and II

Sūrasena, Book IV (सुरसेनेषु सुरतविलासम्) The Mathurā country

Surāstra, Book VI, section 12 Kathiawar Cf सौराष्ट्रीय वलिवाहिनीविनोदकुञ्जर Book I Comm says गिरिनारिसौराष्ट्रियोक्तिस्तु The first name refers to Girnar Hill near Junagarh in Kathiawar

Suvarnadvīpa, Book VII, section 27 Sumatra In the story in question the young merchant Bhādrāmītra along with his companions goes on a voyage to Suvarnadvīpa, and returns after acquiring choice and rare local products in exchange for a huge quantity of merchandise (पुनरगण्यपण्यविनिमयेन तत्रत्यमचिन्त्यमात्माभिमतवस्तुस्कन्धमादाय प्रत्यावर्तमानस्य) See Chap XVI of this book

Tāmalhṛtī, Book VI, section 12 Described as being in Pūrvasesa and Gaudamandala Modern Tamluk in Midnapore District, Bengal

Ujjaymī Described with Avanti in Book II

Valabhī, Book VII, section 23 (अशेषविद्यावैशारद्यमदमचमनीषिमत्तल्लिकुलकेलिकमलनाभ्या वलभ्या पुरि)

Also वलभिरम्भोरविभ्रमभ्रमर Book III Valabhī was the capital of the Maṅtrakas of Surāstra (Kathiawar), and is now represented by the ruins at Wala, about 20 miles N W of Bhavnagar

Vanavāsī 1 211 (वनवासियोषिदीक्षणादिमुग्ध) and 1 189 "Situated in the corner between the Ghāts, the Tungabhadra and the Varadā" Buhler's Introduction to Vikramāṅkadeva-carita Comm on 1 211 says गिरिसोपानगरादिल्लीणम्, that is, the Vanavāsī area contained Girisopā (modern Gersoppa in North Kanara District, Bombay Province) and other cities It may be noted that under 1 211 comm reads गिरिसोपा and not गिरिसोपान, as stated in a footnote on p 181 of the printed edition Vanavāsī is mentioned in the Mahāvamsa XII 31, and, as pointed out by Geiger, there is a modern town Banavāsī in North Kanara Imp Gaz of India, S V See under Kuntala

Vanga 3 247 (अन्यैश्चाङ्गनलिङ्गवद्गपतिभिः) and वङ्गेषु स्फुलिङ्ग etc Book III

Vangāla, Book III वङ्गालेषु मङ्गल etc, p 431 Perhaps the earliest reference to the country of Vangāla in classical Sanskrit literature For other references see D C Ganguly Vangāladēśa in IHQ, December, 1943 "In the eleventh century Dacca District was in the country of Vangāla In the fourteenth century Sonargaon is definitely known to have been the capital of Vangāla, which extended from Dacca to Chittagong" Others think that the southern part of old Vanga came to be known as Vangāla, and identify it with Candradvīpa, i e parts of the Buckergunge District and the adjoining region. See D. Sarkar The City of Bengals in Bhāratiya Vidyā, Vol V, p 36 Vangāla is mentioned in the Tirumalai inscription (1024 A D.) of Rājendra Cola, while the Ablur inscription of Kalacūrya Vijjala (1157-67 A D.) mentions Vanga and Vangāla separately. Ibid. Vangāla has also been identified with south-east Bengal including Chittagong IHQ, Vol XXII, p. 280.

Vangī 1. 210 वङ्गीवन्तिताश्रवणावर्तस, and Book IV वङ्गीमण्डले नृपतिदेशात् etc, p 95. Vangī seems to be the Vengi country, being the districts between the Godāvarī and the Kṛsnā, where ruled the Eastern Cālukyas. But the comm. in both places identifies Vangī with Ratnapura On 1 210 it says वङ्गीवन्तिता विन्तिताया अयोध्याया पूर्वदिक्खीणा रत्नपुरखीणास् Ratnapura (modern Ratanpur in Bilaspur District, C P, to the north of Bilaspur Town) was the capital of Daksina
